A number of testimonies followed, dealing with various branches of the Lord's work. Dr. Baedeker spoke of fruitful meetings and Bible distribution among young German men and women in London; and Mr. Henry Varley gave a brief but impassioned address against the Education Bill, viewing the question from a religious standpoint, and contending that it will mean the increase of priestly power and the curtailment of religious liberty.

CAMBRIDGE.

REV. F. B. MEYER attended the annual conference of the Railway Men's Mission, when he was heartily welcomed by the delegates from forty different missions.

The Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union arranged a mission to be held from last Saturday until the Tuesday following. There had been much prayer for a blessing, and also great efforts to procure it. The Christian men of some colleges made a point of giving a personal invitation to every man of the college; and during the mission a great many went round to fetch others. Rev. F. B. Meyer was the missioner, and God was pleased to use him. Large numbers attended the meetings, and a great many visited the missioner subsequently in his rooms. May God follow the mission with His blessing and establish and strengthen those who were then brought out of darkness into His glorious light.

OXFORD.

IN connection with the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, a lecture was given last week in the Corn Exchange by Rev. C. Grenville Hutchison, deputation secretary. The lecture vividly portrayed the simple faith and Christian devotion of the toilers in the North Sea.

The annual meeting of the Oxford Auxiliary of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 27th ult. The Vice-Chancellor of the University presided, supported by several heads of colleges. The deputation were Rev. W. I. Richards, D.D., for thirty years a C.M.S. missionary at Travancore, who gave a most graphic description of the Society's work in Southern India; and Rev. G. H. Bondfield, the Bible Society's agent in China. The Auxiliary's contributions showed considerable advance on last year's accounts. The contributions amounted to £170.

Irish Notes.

IN recent years there has been a great missionary revival in the Irish Church. For instance, a few years ago the income of the Irish branch of the Church Missionary Society was only about £5,000 a year; but now it is more than four times that amount; and as an illustration of what is being done in poor parishes in the south of Ireland, it may be mentioned that Wexford raised last year £85 for the Church Missionary Society, Gorey £58 15s. 6d., and Enniscorthy £57 7s. 6d. These figures show what can be done for a cause when people's hearts are in the work.

Rev. David J. Cooper, the devoted young missionary who was so barbarously murdered at Fez on October 17, was a native of Belfast, and a member of Albert-bridge Congregational Church, Belfast, of which Rev. Jas. Cregan is the pastor. Mr. Cooper was early converted, and from that time desired to be a missionary. He was an earnest, modest, courageous, self-forgetful young man, and deep sympathy is felt in this country for his widow and her two orphan children in their sore trouble.

East-End Banquet to the Poor.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me once more to ask your readers for their kind help towards the Lord Mayor's annual banquet and entertainment to the poor of the East-End on November 10. The Lord Mayor elect has kindly given twenty guineas, and the sheriffs ten guineas each.

The invitations are distributed to the very poorest, irrespective of creed and denomination.

The public have always supplemented the amount given by the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, and we trust they will again assist, so as to enable us to entertain at least 3,000 guests on November 10.—Donations will be gratefully received by Yours faithfully;

Frederick N. Charrington.

Nepal and Tibet.—The Indian Christian Realm—the majority of whose workers labour near the frontiers of Nepal and Tibet—has for the past three years been sending Gospel heralds into closed Nepal. The well-known missionary, Miss Mary Reed, has recently made over her mission station at Askote to the Indian Christian Realm. Askote is but a few miles from the Nepal frontier. It is hoped that, now, something may also be done to reach the many Tibetans who come down for the winter months, the Lord having sent a valuable reinforcement in the person of a young Englishman who speaks the Tibetan language. About Books.

The Graphic for last week was a double number, and contained illustrations of the incidents in the Royal procession, with special views of the banquet in the City, of the thanksgiving service in St. Paul's, and of the Royal review.

Dr. R. A. Torrey once more places The Gist of the Lessons within reach of Sunday-school teachers. In a handy pocket volume we have here an exposition of the International Lessons for 1903. This is multum in parvo, and it is as useful as it is succinct. (1s. net. Nisbet.)

A Concise Bible Dictionary, based on "The Cambridge Companion to the Bible," has been issued from the warehouse of the Cambridge University Press. (1s. net.) It aims to provide Sunday-school teachers and other students with a handy book of reference. Much useful matter has been compressed into a small space, and the work will assuredly be found of service. It is very compact, and maps are added, with an index of places.

Recognition after Death: What does the Bible Say? By Rev. Septimus Hebert, M.A., late vicar of Iver, Bucks. Words for the bereaved, kind and good. In details of treatment the author will not secure the assent of all who read: but his argument as a whole is well conducted and ably sustained from the Word of God. This tastefully produced booklet is the forerunner of a volume which is to give "Glimpses into Paradise." (1s. net. J. Finch & Co.)

The Encyclopædic Dictionary, orignally issued by Messrs. Cassell about a dozen years ago, has proved a work of great service. Over and above its lexical comprehensiveness, it brings to hand encyclopædic features of a very useful character. How many words there are that remain a puzzle to most readers after the most full and accurate definition! In such cases a verbal description, with comment and illustration, is absolutely essential to a helpful purpose. The "Encyclopædic" does this and much besides, and it has enjoyed a large popularity as issued in various forms. We welcome the first part (6d. net) of a new edition, revised and enlarged. The seven volumes of the past will run to eight in this new form, and over seventy coloured plates will be included. The work is printed on fine paper, and though of greater value than the original edition it is much cheaper in price.

Romanism Supreme, by a South American Missionary (2d. Partridge), is a pamphlet packed with eye-opening facts on the true up-to-date character of Romanism, as witnessed in a land where it holds absolute sway.

Rev. George Freeman has written a booklet, The Christian's Saturday Night, in which an account is given of the prayer meeting held every Saturday evening at Westbourne Grove Chapel. (The Author, 49, Cromwell Road, W.)

Calendars for 1903. Messrs. Walter G. Wheeler & Co. have a particularly comprehensive and excellent stock of Scripture and other Calendars for the ensuing year. Varied in shape, size, and design, suitable for wall or desk, each bearing a helpful message for the day, they mark a pronounced advance on any that we have seen issued by this enterprising firm.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Blackburn Y.M.C.A.

A MISSION has been conducted at the Blackburn Y.M.C.A. by Mr. Bower, of the Regions Beyond Helpers' Union. The Association rooms are small, and proved insufficient to accommodate the people. However, although we were working under difficulties, it was a time of blessing, and souls have been won for the Saviour. With one or two exceptions, the meetings were for men only, and our members have worked well in order to get men in who are but little accustomed to hear the Gospel. Either by an open air service, or (more often) by buttonholing men who are passing along the street or loafing outside public-houses, audiences of "the right sort" have been gathered night after night. On Sunday last upwards of ninety men were brought to the meeting in the latter way by less than a dozen members. There were a number of inquirers, many of them hopeful cases.

Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Sheerness.

Under the auspices of the Isle of Sheppey Sunday School Union, Mr. R. S. Bradbrook has just concluded a mission among the young people of the various Sunday-schools and churches at Sheerness. The mission was thoroughly organized, all the ministers taking a deep interest in the work and loyally supporting the missioner. The work has been very fruitful in results, over 150 of the scholars, many being of the senior section, inquiring the way of salvation, and in the adult meeting a good number have confessed Christ. The afternoon Bible readings were well attended and, as the closing meeting showed, were a blessing to many. When Mr. Bradbrook lectured on his "Perilous Adventures on Sea and Land," the spacious Wesleyan School Hall in the Broadway was packed long before the time to begin. We gladly acknowledge the encouragement we have all received through the mission.

Charles Hare, Hon. Secretary,
Isle of Sheppey S.S.U.

Mr. William Collard in the Borough, S.E.

A nine days' mission was held from October 18 to 27 at Kent Street Ragged School, Amicable Row, Tabard Street, Borough, by Mr. William Collard, "the converted sailor," and God's presence and power in the meetings has been most manifest, the whole neighbourhood being stirred by the visit of his servant.

Though for many years mission work has been carried on in the district, the need for aggressive Christian work and earnest Gospel preaching is still as great as ever, drink, gambling, impurity, and swearing being rife in the district. The experience of God's grace that Mr. Collard has had—after so notorious a life of sin as drunkard, burglar, prizefighter, gaol-bird, and would-be murderer—and his career as missionary in the Australian bush, fit him for such a class of people, and we gladly record to the glory of God a number of cases of blessing. Some whom it has been impossible to persuade to come into the mission have been brought for the first time for many years under the influence of the truth, and many of the roughest lads of the neighbourhood have come out on the Lord's side.

A. W. Payne.

A "Quaker Mission."

The announcement of a "Quaker Mission" has been attracting attention and arousing interest in Canterbury recently. Upon the reading of the twelfth minute of the yearly meeting on ministry and oversight in the Kent Quarterly Meeting a concern arose there with regard to its Duty in "the Propagation of the Gospel." The outcome of this was the holding of a series of meetings, commencing on Lord's Day, October 19, at which the presence and power of the Saviour were blessedly experienced. Friends from various parts of the quarterly meeting engaged in the service, and are deeply thankful for the spirit of loving unity which prevailed. Not the least helpful result of the mission was the drawing together of earnest hearts in a broad-souled effort to extend the kingdom of Christ. Arrangements were made for an afternoon Bible-reading, and a Gospel meeting in the evening. The meetings were held in St. George's Hall, in the centre of the town. Open-air meetings of invitation were also held in many parts of the city. An earnest spirit prevailed, and it was felt that the message of life and peace came to hearts prepared.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Ashton-under-Lyne.

A two months' mission has been undertaken by Mr. Henry Thorne amongst the various P.S.A. Societies in the Lancashire and the neighbouring Federation of P.S.A. and kindred societies. He commenced on Saturday, October 18, by giving the address to the members of the Council of the P.S.A. Federation, who were holding their annual meeting at Ashton-under-Lyne, and made a very favourable impression by the loving way in which he said he was entering on this work. On the Sunday he gave a telling address to about 1,000 men of the P.S.A. In addition he has each evening since held good meetings, and his ripe experience and mastery of the Word of God have been greatly appreciated, and many seekers after truth have been led to Christ. On the second Sunday of the mission a still larger gathering of men, probably 1,200, listened with reverence and conviction, and at the conclusion of the address thirteen stood up and took their stand for the Master. Mr. Thorne's afternoon Bible readings have also been appreciated, and productive of great good. The officers and committee feel that there is a quickening of the Holy Spirit here, and pray for a lasting continuance of it.

Hyde Park Services.

The annual meeting in connection with Open-Air Services conducted nightly in Hyde Park, W., by Mr. G. Williams, was held at Stafford Rooms, Titchborne Street, W., on Thursday last. The hall was crowded.

Mr. William Davis, who presided, gave a short address, in which he advocated the extension of open-air work as a means of filling empty churches. Mr. Harris, of Edinburgh, followed with earnest words of cheer to the young converts. Mr. Williams told of many cases of blessing that have transpired during the past months.

The meeting was notable for the testimonies that were given of God's saving grace. An ex-card sharper told how he had led a young man into play, and won from him a sum of seven pounds sterling. Later the sharper attended the services, and was convinced of sin. He could not find rest, however, for the money was a heavy burden upon him. With a stricken conscience he sought and found the young man, and, in addition to obtaining a promise not to engage in card playing again, returned the money. Then the peace of God entered his soul.

Rev. James Lyall in New Zealand.

Napier, New Zealand, is a beautifully-situated town on Scinde Island, sometimes called "the Naples of the South." In this interesting city Rev. James Lyall has conducted a united mission in the spacious Gaiety Theatre. Following on the Simultaneous Missions held in Melbourne and Sydney, and which have probably been the greatest spiritual demonstrations known in the Southern Hemisphere, expectations were keen in this little city for a share of the blessing. (Mr. Lyall had taken an active part in these missions, and came direct from Dr. Torrey's meetings in Wellington, where a great outpouring of the Spirit of God took place; some 500 conversions, adults and children, being the outcome of the ten days' mission.) The night meeting on the opening day, September 7, was unique in the history of Napier. The theatre was packed with an eager throng. Mr. Lyall is a Spirit-taught missioner, and the vast audience was soon under the influence of the message of Life, delivered with power. On the second Sunday the building was again crowded to excess. In the afternoon the Sunday-school scholars packed the body of the hall, and on the invitation being given some 150 children entered the inquiry-room and sought the Saviour. A large number of adults also confessed Christ during the mission.

Rev. W. Y. Fullerton at Salters' Hall Church, N.

Although Rev. W. Y. Fullerton has his hands full of work in connection with his own church at Leicester, he felt it was God's will that he should consent to accept the invitation to conduct a mission at Salters' Hall Baptist Church, Canonbury, N. A splendid band of workers welcomed Mr. Fullerton on Saturday, October 11, and listened to an inspiring address from the evangelist. On the Sunday evening the church was packed to excess with anxious hearers, the result being the uplifting of His saints and the joy of Christ's saving grace experienced in many hearts. As the mission proceeded we were continually hearing of those who had been specially mentioned before the Throne of Grace during the preliminary prayer meetings, being brought to a saving knowledge of the truth. These included the unconverted relatives of Christian people. Meetings for children were also held, the young people taking deep interest in Mr. Fullerton's addresses.

Cards were issued to those desirous of being prayed for, and upwards of 100 adults and 150 children handed in their names in this way. Most of these have come to decision for Christ. On the last day a thanksgiving meeting was held. Owing to Mr. Fullerton having to return to Leicester, Rev. James Smith conducted the three final services.

St. James-the-Less, Bethnal Green, E.

After an interval of nearly twenty years a Parochial Mission has been held in the parish of St. James the-Less, Bethnal Green. For over twelve months careful preparation has been made and earnest prayer offered for a great blessing, and the prayer has been abundantly answered. The missioner, Rev. W. M. Stone, vicar of St. Mary's, Kilburn, threw himself heart and soul into the work. Every effort was made to bring in the careless and the lost. Night by night a van paraded the streets with a large sheet upon which Gospel scenes were thrown and words of hymns, which were heartily sung by the crowds which quickly gathered round. The men's service bands went out in such numbers that practically the whole parish was stirred night by night, while every house was visited daily.

Inside the church the mission choir, numbering 200 adults, sang the Gospel message as the congregation assembled. On the two Sundays 800 men were present, while on the Sunday evenings the church was crowded. Even on the week nights, when so many of the people of such a parish return home late and weary, the congregation never fell below seven hundred. The addresses of the missioner aimed straight at the conscience, and without any emotional sensationalism were full of sound Gospel teaching.

Mere numbers of the many who signed the pledge, or even put up their hands as a token of surrender to Christ, can give no idea of the real blessing given. On the last night of the mission, as man after man and woman after woman came up to receive at the hand of the missioner the memorial card, many could not repress the tears of joy. Drunkards, backsliders, Romanists, all were there ready to acknowledge the power of God as mighty to save. One striking feature was the number of men who came out boldly for Christ. The whole parish work has received a great impetus, and praise is offered for a wonderful blessing vouchsafed to this East End parish.

Gipsy Smith at Shoreditch.

It was a striking change for Gipsy Smith to turn from the cosmopolitan audiences of St. James' Hall in the west of the Metropolis, and the upper class suburban congregations of Crouch Hill in the north, to the struggling toilers of Shoreditch in the east. But the mission at Pastor Cuff's well-known Tabernacle has proved equal to the others both in attendances and the blessing manifested. The building has been filled nightly with earnest and reverent hearers. The continued absence of Mr. Cuff, who is abroad, was much regretted, but the church officers laboured with praiseworthy vigour in making the necessary arrangements, and in the result the mission, watered by the prayers of the Lord's people, was a time of revival. One evening Dr. Monro Gibson took acceptable part. He conducted the first portion of the service with spirit, and the prayer in which he led the audience for the salvation of the ungodly awakened fervent responses.

It was by no means an easy task to sway a congregation which included, among many chapel-goers, a considerable sprinkling of outsiders from the adjacent back streets, but Gipsy Smith established the happiest relations with his audience at the start. "A fortnight ago I was preaching at Dr. Parker's. As I left the pulpit a lady spoke to me at the foot of the stairs, and asked, 'Do you remember me?' 'Certainly,' I replied; 'twenty-eight years ago I sold you clothes-pegs.' What a difference in a gipsy through grace! Grace 'lifteth the beggar from the dunghill and sets him among princes.'"

One address, founded on Acts xvi., was especially practical, setting forth the Gospel plan with clearness, and insisting on repentance before belief. "London is full of 'believers.' There are drunkards who believe it is best to be sober, but go on drinking; plenty of thieves who believe it best to be honest, and yet go on thieving. And there are plenty of people who 'believe,' but go on in sin. There is no conviction, no repentance, no saving faith." The damsel possessed with a spirit of divination (v. 16) believed that Paul and Silas were the servants of the most high God, which showed the way of salvation, but she needed to have the devil cast out. The evangelist would have "no mongrel or superficial Gospel Repent, forsake sin, and believe." There was a solemn hush upon the assembly, intensified by the telling illustrations and touches of pathos which made the uncompromising truth additionally forcible. Remarkable scenes were witnessed at the close, when in the inquiry-room many seekers were pointed to the Saviour. During the week over five hundred persons gave their names to the workers, affording ample scope for "following up."

The Welsh Forward Movement.

A twelve days' mission at the Presbyterian Forward Movement Hall, Corporation Road, Newport, Mon., has been conducted by Mr. Chas. E. Barraclough, October 12-23. On Saturday, October 11, a meeting of workers was held, followed by a street parade, headed by the Shaftesbury Street Wesleyan Brass Band, and the whole district, which had already been systematically visited, was made aware of the commencement of the special services.

The meetings on the first Sabbath were unusually well attended, and the missioner's words were used of God in much blessing to His people and the conversion of sinners. The afternoon service was organised specially for young people, and the powerful address delivered by Mr. Barraclough will long live in our hearts and memories.

Services were held on each week-night, preceded by open-air service and procession. The interest was well sustained throughout, eager crowds listening each night to the simple Gospel, earnestly and eloquently preached.

The last Sunday saw the hall, which has seating accommodation for 1,000 people, well filled, and again there were many inquirers. The feature of the day's services was the afternoon meeting for men only, when some 500 were present.

The mission on the whole proved of great benefit to the Church. While some declare that means other than the Gospel are necessary to attract the masses, and when morbid sensationalism is frequently resorted to, it was refreshing to note that the pure Gospel has still its old-time drawing power, for night after night until the close of the mission there were large numbers of eager listeners to the truth.

On Thursday, October 23, Dr. Pugh, of Cardiff (founder of the Forward Movement), presided over a meeting of members and converts, and spoke on the privileges and duties of Church members.

Sidney B. Evans, Pastor.

The Australian Revival.

Following on the recent Simultaneous Mission in Australia, efforts are being put forth to reach the outlying places by means of tent missions. A gracious spirit of inquiry has come at many of these. Of Singleton, N.S.W., where Rev. D. O'Donnell was missioner, The Budget says:—"Every morning throughout the ten days of the mission a united meeting was held in the tent at seven o'clock, and these were some of the most blessed seasons of all. As many as 350 came out one morning, and often there were 150 and 200 in spite of the bitterly cold weather. The spirit of grace and supplication was poured out, and joy took hold of all.

"The services of the mission were of two classes—viz., Bible reading in the afternoon and Gospel services at night. The former were characterized by much fervour and solid teaching of the Word. In the evening meetings, from the first the attendance filled the large tent, sometimes literally packed it with men and women eager to hear the gracious message of God from the lips of His servant. The audiences were not confined to any one class. The member for the district was often seen there, and many leading citizens of the town came night after night.

"In addition to some hundreds of recorded cases of inquiry, there were others who accepted Christ as their Saviour in the streets, homes, and shops of the town, some of the best cases of conversion being the result of button-holing and personal efforts. The whole place was stirred, and Jesus and His love and power to save seemed to be the one theme that pervaded and held the attention of the people.

"The inquiry room was a scene never to be forgotten—quietness prevailed, but the atmosphere seemed charged with heaven's influence and power, as one soul after another quietly and decidedly accepted Jesus as his or her Saviour, and with Him pardon of all their sins and eternal life, and thus were born of God—the seed had fallen on good ground prepared by the Holy Ghost. Never in a long experience, remarked one of the workers, had he known it to be so easy to lead souls into the light. Among the converts were three or four Roman Catholics, many of whom came to the tent in spite of the fact that an opposition mission was held by the Romanists."

The Victoria Theatre, S.E.

If there had been doubts in one's mind as to whether a "pictorial Gospel" service was useful in attracting the people, the wonderful sight of the motley crowd collected at a typical service of the Bible Christian Mission within the walls of the "Vic.," filling the pit, and, indeed, every available part of the house, was sufficient to settle the question.

Here were to be seen "'Arry" and 'Arriet," full of frolic, indeed, as they came in, but marvellously well-behaved when fairly ensconced in their seats and the service had commenced. Close-cropped hair, broken noses, and glaring neckerchiefs indexed several jail-birds.

In the upper boxes there were small tradesmen and their wives, and sometimes their children; indeed, we noticed that all over the house there was scattered a typical gathering of boys and girls, who are always glad to see pictures. Two thousand three hundred persons were thus drawn to this pictorial Gospel service. A voluntary string band helped the musical part of the service, and various solos were earnestly and intelligently rendered by two young ladies.

Rev. D. J. Rounsefell pointedly addressed the gathering, and was aided by a number of pictures rapidly thrown upon the sheet with the aid of a magic lantern. By these illustrations, and the preacher's earnest words, the drunkard, the gambler, and the immoral were all faithfully dealt with, and it was clear that no end but that of reclamation, and not mere recreation, was the design of the service.

Since these services were inaugurated at the "Vic." four years ago, there has been an aggregate congregation of no fewer than 250,000 persons attending them, of whom several hundreds have openly announced their intention of becoming Christians, whilst upwards of a thousand have signed the temperance pledge. Nor has the pastoral work of the Waterloo Road Chapel, of which Mr. Rounsefell is the pastor, been neglected, for the services have not been commenced until the ordinary gatherings of the chapel have been ministered to, either by the pastor or his colleague. B.

Mr. James Bell writes:—"We have had a most encouraging ten days' mission at the Primitive Methodist Church, Durham, with Mr. and Mrs. Harrison, of Birkenhead."

A series of fruitful evangelistic services has been conducted by Miss Glover at Bowden, St. Boswells, N.B. The interest awakened at the beginning was sustained until the close. During the week nights the services were well attended, and on the Sabbath evenings the public hall was full, some of the people having walked long distances. N. M. A.

The new and beautiful hall at St. Olave's Institute, near the Tower Bridge, Southwark, has been opened for Sunday evening services by the Committee for Special Religious Services, 3, Bridewell Place, E.C. An efficient choir and band of workers has been organized. The hall has been well filled from the artizan population of the neighbourhood.

The Free Church Council at Hetton Down, co. Durham, arranged evangelistic services in the Miners' Hall, conducted by Rev. Jesse Mayo. The building, which holds about 1,200 people, was nearly filled on Sundays, and good companies attended through the week. There have been some notable cases of blessing, and the mission has done much good.

James Bell, F.C.C. Secretary.

A fifteen days' mission, conducted by Mr. A. W. Smart, of the Evangelization Society, in Immanuel Baptist Church, Middlesbrough, was concluded on October 19. The meetings were well attended. The evangelist's earnest appeal to the unconverted produced a profound impression on many souls. The church looks to receive a harvest of souls from the mission.

By permission of Colonel Bulpett, Messrs. Hanson and Swift, of the Church Army, have been holding services in the Albany Barracks, Parkhurst. Every facility was given to make the services effective, and the men showed their appreciation by coming up in good numbers. Kindly help was also given by Rev. A. C. H. Edlin, Chaplain. Limelight views were shown for half an hour each evening before the service; more than fifty men signed the pledge, and a goodly number came out boldly for Christ.

The Presbyterian congregation at Willington, co. Durham, has been stimulated and helped by a short series of evangelistic services conducted by Rev. W. F. Holt, Synod Evangelist. For five nights Mr. Holt preached to steadily-growing and deeply-interested gatherings, the final meetings being taken part in by very large congregations. The power of God's Spirit in all the services was very manifest, and an earnestness has been awakened in the hearts of the people which must yield fruit.

At Auburn, N.Y., Mr. Charles Inglis commenced a mission in the First Presbyterian Church on October 19. Large audiences assembled at each of the three services. The Auburn Daily Advertiser of October 20 said:—"An immense audience greeted Mr. Inglis at the evening service. The body of the church was filled with men, while the galleries were occupied with women. Mr. Inglis's discourse was based on Job xxxiii.: 'Man's Condition Described; God's Provision Declared and God's Warning Uttered.' Speaking of men being asleep denoted an insensibility, insecurity and ignorance. He reminded his audience of what a ransom was. It was the price paid for the liberation of a captive, and he also pointed out that God's ransom was for all mankind. He reminded them of God's warning uttered, and closed with a thrilling appeal for his audience to decide for Christ. A large number remained for the second meeting, and not a few received lasting blessing."

KEEN DISTRESS AMONG THE POOR AND OUTCAST.

101, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C.
November, 1902.

Dear Friend,

The terrible shadow of Starvation and Want is over our land. Our hundreds of Slum-Sisters, Shelter, Rescue, and other Social-Work Officers, report the most harrowing poverty in their fields of labour. Thousands of the poorest are appealing to us for aid. Our great Social Work—we now house over 6,000 nightly—is in most urgent need of help. Can you, by some little personal sacrifice, send us something on their behalf? I beg of you to do so.

Our numerous Homes for Women and Children are full. I long to accommodate more. But what can I do? We have had the best year yet for results, but we were never so poorly supported. I need £7,000 to carry on these 47 Homes for Women. Can you send me something?

Our numerous Homes for Men are full. Many Reservists and discharged soldiers, as well as the drunkard, the criminal, the prodigal, are appealing to us, not for charity, but for "a chance to help myself." Ought they not to have it? To do this we need £8,000 immediately. If every mother or wife of a Christian man who reads this would send us something, the money would be forthcoming. We will gladly undertake the burden of doing the work, for Christ's sake, if those who care for the Poor will enable us to do so. Please help us in His name. Thousands of permanent cases of restoration give us cause for unutterable thankfulness to God.

Yours, on behalf of the Poor and Friendless,

Florence E. Booth

Cheques and P.O.'s should be crossed Bank of England, made payable to William Booth, and sent to me at 101, Queen Victoria Street, London; or to the editor of The Christian.

THE

(ESTABLISHED 1732.)

OLDEST PROTESTANT MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN, FIRST TO THE LEPERS.

About ONE IN SIXTY members is a Missionary. There are gathered under their care from darkest heathenism nearly 100,000, i.e., more than THREE TIMES AS MANY as the Parent Church!

To help these devoted people whom God so blesses, and who, in the preponderating proportion of their Missionaries, are so largely doing the work of other Churches,

THE LONDON ASSOCIATION IN AID

WAS FORMED IN 1817.

The following are some of many PRESSING NEEDS for which EARNEST PRAYER AND SUPPORT ARE SOUGHT.

FOR GENERAL FUND—largely increased Annual help of at least £4,000, if existing Missions are to be maintained and Deficiency averted.

FOR THE LEPER HOME, Jerusalem, where inmates have doubled in number, funds are still urgently wanted to defray the cost of the new Water Reservoir, &c.

FOR LABRADOR, hitherto self-supporting, but crippled for a time in its resources, £2,000 annually is required for a few years, until the Mission can be re-established. For this need, and to avert loss to the General Fund, an ADDITIONAL Fund is being raised.

Contributions will be thankfully received and information given by the Rev. W. Wetton Cox, at the Offices of the London Association, 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., who will also gladly arrange for Meetings, Sermons, Lectures, &c.

DONATIONS

Received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, to Monday, November 3, 1902.

 All amounts received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott for charitable purposes are remitted WITHOUT ANY DEDUCTION WHATEVER to the institutions for which the gifts are sent.

 Will donors oblige by stating explicitly and fully the titles of the institutions to which they wish their donations to be applied? Further correspondence will thus be obviated.

 Cheques, Money Orders, or Postal Orders should be made payable to Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C., and crossed "London City and Midland Bank, Ltd." This will effectually prevent loss.

Bridge of Hope (Miss Steer).—L.B., 2s., and a parcel of new garments.

Mr. Allenson has published a fifth edition of Dr. Parker's stirring booklet GAMBLING IN VARIOUS ASPECTS (3d.), being the substance of a speech delivered in Exeter Hall on Nov. 29, 1897.

A SAD CASE OF BLINDNESS.

A young girl, of most respectable family, totally blind, whose parents are quite unable to support her. Her mother is a chronic invalid and has just undergone a serious operation, which was only partially successful. The father is delicate, and is breaking down entirely under the continued strain of family sickness. The youngest child, a boy of eleven years of age, is also a great invalid. The girl is now studying, in order to keep herself, as a teacher to the blind. Funds are needed to keep her at school, and to meet the needs of the family, which are very great. The case is a remarkably sad one, as the father formerly held a good position in life.

The Rev. J. PULLEIN-THOMPSON, Hon. Sec. to the National Blind Relief Society, The Vicarage, 27, Tite Street, Chelsea, S.W., will be grateful for donations, which are urgently needed; or may be sent to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

Additional FUNDS are GREATLY NEEDED to meet the increasing demands on the Charity, for which the committee make an earnest appeal.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, DONATIONS, and BEQUESTS will be thankfully received at the Institution, by

Welsh Notes.

THE pastorate of the Windsor Place Presbyterian Church, Cardiff, has been vacant for some months; the church and congregation have now given a call to Rev. W. L. Robertson, M.A., Greenock. Mr. Robertson is a son of Rev. Patrick Robertson, a well-known Presbyterian minister near Edinburgh. The work at Greenock has been markedly successful.

The autumn quarterly meeting of the English Presbytian churches of North Wales has been held at Llandudno. One of the questions discussed was the formation of a Presbytery for North Wales. A resolution was passed to refer the matter to the churches represented with a view to ascertaining their decision.

A month or two ago a School of Theology was held in North Wales. It is now probable that the southern part of the Principality will follow the lead thus set. At the autumnal meetings of the Brecon Congregational College the question came up for discussion, with the result that representatives of the various denominations are to be invited to meet to promote the scheme.

The report of the Home Mission Society of the South Wales Calvinistic Methodist Association has just been issued. The contributions to the fund of the society last year amounted to some £1,200. In addition, the sum of £300 was received from the Association fund, and £250 from the fund of the General Assembly. A large number of mission churches have received grants of varying amount.

Personalia.

Mr. Samuel James Capper, well known for his faithful Christian testimony, was, on October 26, married at their future home, "Villa Concordia," Libau, Kurland, Russia, to Isabella, Baroness von Behr-Nolde, late of Schloss-Kalleton, and granddaughter of John Horrocks, of Tullichewen Castle, Scotland, and 10, Prince's Gate, London.

Pastor G. W. Gillings, owing to the breakdown of his wife's health after eighteen years' service in India, is obliged to take her to Australia for a season of rest. Their address will be c/o "Leagher," Studley Park Road, Kew, Victoria, Australia.

Sunday and Society.—Lady Frederick Cavendish, in an excellent paper read recently before a women's meeting at Northampton, frankly admitted that the classes of society in which she moves are greatly addicted to Sabbath desecration. An evil example soon permeates downwards, but that Sunday is largely losing its sacred character among us is due to a great extent, it must unhappily be admitted, to the domestic and social surroundings of the labouring and poorer classes, which to a certain degree render the due observance of the day of rest a very difficult task. If, however, in regard to these people some extenuating circumstances must be recognised, none can reasonably be claimed for the upper sections of society. As regards those, the Sunday question resolves itself simply into one of principle and religion, and the absence of those influences as evinced by the wilful neglect of God's commandment by the people who find six days too short a period for their round of pleasures. Perhaps if some of these voices of protest were lifted up in the hearing of the higher social circles some good would result. As it is they are only too often spoken to the wind.

The Churches.

Church of England.

A ten-days' mission has been arranged at Erith to commence on November 8. The missioners are to be as follows:—At the Parish Church, Rev. S. R. Cambie; St. Paul's Church, Rev. C. de Carteret; Christ Church, missioners from All Hallows, Barking.

The anniversary gatherings of the Gleaners' Union of the C.M.S. were held last week. On Friday afternoon a meeting, addressed by home and foreign workers, was held in Exeter Lower Hall, and in the evening the annual meeting was held in the Large Hall under the presidency of the Bishop of Wakefield. Mr. E. M. Anderson, secretary, stated that 7,532 new members have been enrolled during the year. The union is supporting thirteen "own missionaries," and has contributed for that purpose £1,326. Bishop Taylor Smith, Chaplain-General of the Forces, also addressed the meeting.

The annual meeting in connection with St. John's, Portsea, was held on October 22 in the Albert Hall, Portsmouth, and was presided over by Rev. Lindsay Young (vicar), who was supported by Revs. J. C. Martin and A. Day, Commander Key, R.N., and other friends. In the course of an address, the vicar said that great interest is being taken in the rising generation at St. John's; for, while the general congregation is assembled in church on Sunday evening for Divine worship, a large mission service for young people is being conducted in the schoolroom, attended by at least 150, who pay great attention to the Gospel message.

The Annual Students' Meeting on behalf of foreign missions was held at St. John's Hall, Highbury, on October 23. A representative body of 170 men was gathered together from King's College, the C.M.S. College, St. John's Hall, the London Hospital, and other centres. Rev. J. Lightfoot, Principal of the C.M.S. College, presided. Rev. Eyre Chatterton, of Chota Nagpur, portrayed the immense progress made by mission work in India, and showed how Christianity changed the lives of the people. Rev. G. T. Manley, of the C.M.S., made a very forcible appeal for offers of service, and in the closing address the Chaplain-General (Bishop Taylor-Smith) told the story of his own conversion, and begged each man to follow, not merely a will of God, but the will—the design which his Master had mapped out for him.

Congregational.

Though the recent slight improvement in the health of Dr. Parker has been maintained, his continued weak condition is the source of much anxiety to his friends, and especially to the responsible officials at the City Temple.

The Wednesday mid-day services at Silver Street Church, Falcon Square, E.C., started by Rev. C. H. Davies a month ago, have proved so successful that they are to be continued in the future as a permanent branch of Church work. The time of the service is from 1.15 to 1.45.

It is announced that Rev. Elvet Lewis is engaged in preparing for publication a Welsh translation of "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas à Kempis. The work is to appear in a series of Welsh Classics issued under the auspices of the Guild of Graduates of the Welsh University.

Dr. John Brown, of Bedford, intends resigning his charge at the end of the present year, after remaining pastor of Bunyan meeting for over thirty-eight years, and being altogether in the ministry for forty-eight years. For twenty-three years Dr. Brown has also presided over the Bedfordshire Union, and in 1891 he was chairman of the Congregational Union.

At a recent Church meeting at the Tabernacle, Trowbridge (pastor, Rev. A. J. Pearse, M.A.), a resolution was passed pledging the Church to renewed efforts on behalf of the London Missionary Society. This took practical shape at the missionary anniversary meetings now just concluded, when a sum of nearly £34 was raised in aid of the Society.

At the church at Horsham a welcome gathering to meet the new pastor, Rev. W. E. Talbot, has been held. Addresses were given by the deacons, and other workers. Mr. Talbot, in responding, said he was a great lover of village work, and was glad there were four village causes attached to the parent Church. He announced that all his family were teetotalers, and would endeavour to develop temperance work.

Rev. D. Burford Hooke, secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, has completed his extended tour in Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, and is expected to arrive in the first week in December. During his journey he has been much impressed with the need for the inauguration of a forward movement in the colonies by the Congregational Churches. He has been instrumental in securing new sites for the erection of churches in New Zealand, and has been much struck with the devotion of the laity in Christian work.

Baptist.

The fourth anniversary of the church at Woodside, Croydon, has been celebrated. On the Lord's Day the pastor, Rev. W. H. Gaussen, preached in the morning, and in the evening the pulpit was acceptably occupied by Principal M'Caig, of the Pastors College. At a public meeting encouraging reports of progress, in point alike of membership and finance, were presented. Towards the building fund the sum of £186 has been contributed during the year. Interesting addresses were delivered by Revs. George Turner, of Sutton, and J. G. Train, of Upper Norwood.

Pastor D. H. Moore, of Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, W.C., has issued a circular letter to his congregation on the subject of "Personal Effort," in the course of which he says:—"There are many gracious tokens God is now giving us of increased prayerfulness, conversions, and increased attendance at the House of God, which lead me to hope we are on the eve of great blessing in our midst. I am convinced more and more that the secret of the world's salvation to God lies in the consecrated efforts of individual Christians."

Methodist.

The building of the new Wesleyan Mission premises in Bishopsgate Street, E.C., is now rapidly being pushed forward. The committee hope to be in their new quarters on the old ground soon after the next conference.

The United Methodist Free Church has achieved a noble record in and around London during the last few years in the way of Church extension. New and commodious churches have been erected at Streatham, East Ham, Ilford, Willesden, and Vauxhall.

The Wesleyan Missionary Secretaries are much encouraged by the accounts which are reaching them concerning the observance of the Day of Intercession this year. These exhibit to a cheering degree the extent and the character of foreign missionary revival. "Not only is a new interest in the evangelization of the world manifesting itself, but the interest is spiritual in its character, springing from the deeper motives of the religious life, and leading those in whom it is awakened to earnest prayer and solemn consecration."

Under the superintendence of Rev. Vallance C. Cook, the Dalston Wesleyan Mission continues to make steady and consistent progress. The distinctly spiritual phases of the work, as well as the social and philanthropic efforts, have been abundantly fruitful. The mission continues unsectarian aggression, with that due provision for Church life so necessary to thorough and permanent results.

Presbyterian.

As a direct result of the three weeks' open-air mission held in connection with Somers Town Presbyterian Church, Rev. Z. B. Woffendale gave the right hand of fellowship to twenty new members at the close of the evening service on Sunday evening last. This is the twenty-ninth year of Mr. Woffendale's ministry in Somers Town.

November 9 concludes the week that has been appointed by the Synod for self-denial in order to secure offerings towards Home Missions. The appeal of the Religion and Morals Committee on this behalf has been sent out to the various congregations, and it should meet with a ready and liberal response.

At Trinity Church, Cheetham Hill, Manchester, during Rev. W. J. Jack's seven years' ministry, a new church, with caretaker's house and lecture hall, has been built, and the debt reduced to a comparatively small amount; while there has been a considerable increase in the membership.

Society of Friends.

Friends interested in the mission at Halton, Hastings, are rejoicing in the fact that the entire cost of building, furnishing, and decorating the new hall has now been met. Adult schools for men and women, Gospel meetings Sundays and during the week, and a Band of Hope are among the Christian activities of the work.

The autumn meeting was held at Tunbridge Wells, and a good company of Friends attended. The meeting on Ministry and Oversight was held on the evening of the 22nd ult. Especial attention was given to the sixth Duty, the propagation of the Gospel, led up to by the minute of the yearly meeting on ministry and oversight. Afterwards Georgina King Lewis ably set forth the harmony of peace, and the discord of war, with Christ's teaching.

Salvation Army.

The New York City Council has granted to the Salvation Army five thousand dollars in aid of the rescue work carried on by the Army in that city.

As a result of meetings conducted by the Army's officers in the Honolulu Penitentiary, Sandwich Islands, a Salvation Army Corps has been established among the inmates of that prison.

The Government of Java has asked the Army to take over the control of 500 orphan children of the State. Owing to the distress existing in the island through commercial depression, Government relief to the sufferers has been established, and all arrangements have been undertaken by the Salvation Army at the Government's request.

A correspondent writes: "Mr. J. J. Browne recently conducted Lord's Day services at the Mission Hall, Etheridge, Broxbourne. Mr. Stuart Trotter, of the London City Mission, took part. On the Monday the meetings were continued, and addresses were delivered by Mr. Browne and other friends. Solos were given by Misses Clarke, Rudd, and others. Much blessing has rested upon Mr. Browne's labours, and upon those of the devoted ladies in the town who conduct mission work in connection with the coffee house.

The opening services of the Peoples's Hall, Slade Mission Hall, Plumstead Common, S.E., were held on October 29. In the evening the hon. superintendent, Mr. D. Carnegie, spoke of the attractiveness and comfort of the new premises. "Our object is to win the people; and the accommodation we now have will more than double our possibilities." The cost was £1,100, of which £400 remains to be raised. Among others who took part were Colonel Yates, who presided, Revs. E. D. de Rusett and J. More and Mr. John Wood. In the afternoon a sermon was preached by Rev. Edwin H. Ellis, of the East London Tabernacle.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. Gregory A. Page, a veteran of Wesleyan Methodism. Thirty or forty years ago no name was more highly venerated in the Pottery district of Staffordshire, where he travelled several times.—At Loudwater, Bucks, Mrs. Raleigh, widow of the late Dr. Alexander Raleigh.—On Thursday last, Rev. William Hamilton, who for many years was pastor of the Baptist congregation at Battersea Chapel. He received his training at the Pastors' College, and the late C. H. Spurgeon chose him, in 1876, to proceed to Cape Town to open a new cause for the denomination there. When he returned to England in 1885 he accepted the pastorate of Battersea Chapel. He took an active interest in local affairs, and as a member of the London School Board took up a strong line in opposition to the action of Mr. Athelstan Riley.—At Knockninny, Co. Fermanagh, Henry Crozier, a devoted and earnest Methodist class leader and Sunday-school superintendent.—Mrs. W. Zeytoon (née R. Hunt, of Bristol) died in Beyrout in September, and after a long and painful illness, borne with fortitude, was laid to rest in the Friends' Burying Ground in Brumana, in the neighbourhood in which she had lived since 1889. She was a help to sufferers and a witness to the truth of Christianity.—Brigadier Von Tavel-Haartman, daughter of a Finnish nobleman, and the first Salvation Army officer in Finland.—By the death of Mr. William Lancaster, J.P., in his ninetieth year, Burnley Methodism loses a generous supporter.—Sister Dorothy Coy, one of the first Wesleyan Deaconesses, and the superintendent of the Deaconess Home at Leicester since its establishment in 1901.—Mr. Henry Goddard, of Fernham, Berkshire, for twenty-five years evangelist in the Vale of Berks., passed away on the 29th ult., aged sixty-three years, after a few days' illness. He was a devoted worker, visiting the cottages and scattered hamlets with assiduity. He will be greatly missed in the locality.

Rev. Dr. Torrey. This esteemed evangelist expects to reach England about the end of December, and desires that all communications may be addressed to the care of Messrs. Morgan & Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

Romanism in Italy. Rev. Dr. Robertson, of Venice, author of "Count Campello and Catholic Reform in Italy," "Fra Paolo Sarpi," "The Bible of St. Mark," &c., has written a work which is calculated to excite considerable attention. It is entitled, "The Roman Catholic Church in Italy," and will be published shortly by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. Various articles from Dr. Robertson's pen which have appeared from time to time in The Christian, will have prepared our readers to expect a thoroughly vigorous exposure of the iniquitous system which has been designated "Baptized Paganism."

A Remarkable Contrast. It is a curious and suggestive fact that while the Government of France, the land of "free thought," has been recently exerting itself to the utmost in breaking the power of sacerdotalism, the English Government is busy forging its chain round the necks of the people through the legalisation of sacerdotal teaching in the schools. The reason for this contrast is that France has realized the effect of this evil through centuries of experience, while England was saved from that sad fate by the Puritan revolution. It would be a wise thing if our legislators took home to themselves the lesson which has been learned at such bitter cost across the Channel. It is nothing short of blindness if we fail to do this before it is too late. The bane of the one nation ought to be a warning to the other.

The Reverse of the Medal. Yet, in face of the present attitude of the bulk of the French nation towards Romanism, a writer in a Ritualist monthly, urges that we have much to learn from Romanism in France. Deprecating what he terms "the deathly void," which he says men have made in England and call "pure religion," he draws a highly imaginative picture of the great spiritual army moving under perfect discipline, its marching orders clear and well understood, its objective determined and well known, the officers possessing the confidence of the rank and file.

Apparently the writer does not read the (Roman) Catholic Times, for that journal has for some time back been publishing authoritative statements of the actual condition of things; in which "the priests supported there by the State are alone in the Church, like St. John in the desert." It says:—

There are millions of good fervent Catholics in France, but the sad truth is that more millions are cold, apathetic, hostile, and that the Catholic Church has decidedly lost her hold. France is no longer a Catholic nation.

In addition to this personal testimony from a "missionary apostolic," Le Gaulois, the leading R.C. daily, recently said:—

They have deserted the Church, and irreligion is now the régime of French Society. There are now two-thirds of our Departments where no one knows the road to the Church. . . . There is a complete lifelessness of religious feeling . . . the population have ceased to attend the Church.

The Real Point at Issue. Amid some misrepresentation and not a little exaggeration, on the part of public speakers about the Education Bill, the Church Times clears the ground in a wildly indignant article anent Col. Kenyon-Slaney's amendment of Clause XII., which, our contemporary urges, opines that a body, consisting perhaps of a domineering squire, a couple of farmers, and two Dissenters, is more competent than a man in Holy Orders to decide theological questions and to define the Faith of the Church. . . But if the religious instruction given is to be not that which the parish priest desires, but merely that which a hybrid body, partly composed of Dissenters, is good enough to sanction. . . . it will be much better to close our schools at once, and to retain the buildings for our own purposes.

Ignoring the uncomplimentary epithets quoted above, the words we have italicised amply justify our contention that the real effect of the Bill would be to place the children—Church and Nonconformist alike—under the sacerdotal thumb.

How Rome Regards it. Cardinal Vaughan has issued a circular to the Superiors of convents calling upon them to offer up prayers for the safe passing of the Bill. "The Education Bill before Parliament," observes the Cardinal, "concerns so intimately our Catholic schools and the freedom of Christianity in England, that its passing into law without any substantial amendment injurious to religion is a matter of the very highest importance." We may hold our own opinion as to the so-called "freedom" of Christianity under Rome, but there is no mistaking the satisfaction of the priesthood as to the Bill itself.

Triumph of Publicans. Genuine regret is felt among Scottish temperance and philanthropic workers at the fact that ex-Lord Provost Chisholm has been unable to secure re-election to the Glasgow Town Council. He has been for many years one of the strongest leaders in the city in the direction of reform, and his rejection by the electors will be regarded as a victory by the publican party. It was to be expected that so great a movement for righteousness as has been in progress would be hindered as far as possible by the enemy; but temporary delays ought to be times of marshalling forces for yet greater strides. One of many important points gained during the past three years has been the appointment of a number of Christian workers as Justices of the Peace, including Mr. Alexander Mackeith, the well-known evangelist among children. Much has been gained; and there is reason to believe that the sympathy of the community will be stronger on the side of temperance when a little experience has been gained of the objects and methods of the opposing party.

Drinking Amongst Women. The very outspoken address of Sir Thomas Barlow to a crowded audience of ladies at the Church House last week, on "Intemperance amongst Women," should do something towards directing the attention of philanthropists and others to the causes of this sad habit, and to the remedies against it:—

Lack of occupation on the part of women whose husbands leave them during the day, worry, bodily weakness, he mentioned as some of the causes. Case of heredity were rare. The encouragement of example in youth was more often a cause. Drink might become a disease, but it started as an indulgence. Even doctors and nurses were foolish enough to say, "Why deprive them of the thing which gives them comfort?" It was necessary to stop that damnable thing. It could be done provided there were no friends who were such criminal lunatics as to smuggle in alcohol. Let them have teetotal doctors and nurses.

For his optimistic note concerning the reclamation of the woman fallen through drink we are thankful; the fallacy that a drunken woman is irrecoverable needs destroying by a master's hand, and that Sir Thomas Barlow has done. The Bishop of London also gave startling figures concerning the evil among both rich and poor, and referred also to the spirit clubs held in factories among the girls. What Satanic ingenuity there is in the pushing of this fearful trade!

Woman's Power to Restrain. We could wish that all women might read the sermon preached in St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, to the National Union of Women Workers a few days ago. It touches a note which sadly needs enforcing, as to the power of women, in purifying the moral tone of society. The preacher pleaded for "Puritan strictness" among women, with regard to the books they read, and the men they receive into their society. The remarkable laxity in speech and manners which has set in of late years could be checked, if not changed, if women remembered and employed their power. A nation's morals, it has been said, are in the hands of women. We are quite aware that Puritan strictness on their part might not change men's evil hearts, but it would at least change the atmosphere around us, and so remove a grave danger. Let women resolutely refuse to patronize "risky" novels, and the latter would soon die. Let them ostracise men of loose or godless life, and who could tell the result in good?

Wage-Earning Children. It is to be hoped that some very practical results will follow the discussion at the recent Edinburgh Conference of Women Workers in regard to child labour. The question is not free from difficulties, but while it must be recognised that total prohibition of remunerated work for young children is scarcely practicable, it certainly is clearly evident that legislation should be undertaken, to limit both the hours and the range of children's work. That thousands of little ones should suffer from the greed of unworthy parents, and selfish employers who "exploit" them, is highly discreditable to our modern progress.

A Chance for Young Transgressors. During the last few weeks an experiment has been tried in New York in dealing with youthful offenders, which thus far has been a striking success. Boys and girls who fall into the hands of the police are carefully screened from association with old criminals. They are detained over night elsewhere than in the common cells, and the court where their offences are tried is different from the ordinary court. In this way it becomes easy to deal with first offenders, without branding them with the fatal mark of the criminal. We should like to see something of the kind operating in this country. We ought to be very compassionate towards child offenders, remembering how so many of them are brought up; and if the dignity of the court could be blended with paternal solicitude in the way we have described, many a child might have a chance of leading a better life who, under the present system, grows hard.

The Hate of Race. The stories that frequently reach this country as to the intensity of the race feeling in America, make us blush for our humanity. The latest case—that concerning the daughter of Dr. Booker Washington—is more than painful in its refined cruelty. This gifted child of a gifted father has been compelled to leave a fashionable training college, on account of the persecution to which she was subjected because of her colour. We are told that the students who have embittered this girl's life, and sought to spoil her career, are "ladies"—daughters of "aristocratic southerners." What are the churches doing in those parts that this blind, unreasoning hatred is as vigorous now as in the olden time? We can understand race hatred among savages, but among civilized and professing Christian people it is intolerable, for one of the fundamentals of the Gospel is that all are one in Christ.

The Responsibilities of Empire. The report of the Colonial Conference, which has just been issued as a Blue Book, brings into strong relief the one idea which seems to dominate our statesmen at the present moment, i.e., the consolidation of the Empire. The preservation of the unity of the Imperial fleet was the chief thing insisted upon; for, of course, humanly speaking, our security from invasion depends upon that. This, and the other points discussed, are of prime importance, but they are all political or semi-political. If honour and justice prevail in the Empire, consolidation will be a great strength, but there can be no true consolidation unless justice triumphs. There is a side to the whole question which was not touched upon at the Conference; it is that of the responsibility of Empire. It is easy to get men to laud the glory of an Imperial race, but that race needs to recognise, more than it does at present, its responsibilities as well as its privileges. Our Empire contains 250,000,000 of heathens. Do our people understand what that means? It is not the work of statesmen to preach the Gospel, but it is their work to make the way of those who do preach it abroad easier than it is at present.

Taking up the Anchors. Mr. G. S. Mead, in a scholarly paper in the current Nineteenth Century, takes occasion, in furnishing some valuable Notes on the Gnostics, to censure strongly the so-called Higher Criticism and its leaders, whose views are, as a rule, so directly opposed to the generally-received tenets of Christian belief. He says, justly, that after reading most of their effusions the believer may well say, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him," and he deplores the fact that the iconoclastic views are held by several of those whose duty is to train candidates for the Christian ministry. Mr. Mead's paper is a powerful contribution on the other side, and, while helpful in removing some difficulties, it does not attempt to tamper with the foundations.

Service the Compulsion of Life. The last argument on behalf of Christian service generally, and foreign missions in particular, has not yet been advanced. All that has yet held good as a motive for the prosecution of our Lord's commission still holds, and will continue to hold good. But the acquisition of fresh knowledge supplies other imperative reasons why the Divine command to evangelize the world is so necessary. Thus the modern scientific insistence upon the tendency of all things towards unity—an old truth, by the way, in a new dress—has a great bearing upon missions, both home and foreign. Those Christians who refuse their aid in the work of direct evangelization, whether at home or abroad, are not only abstaining from good, but are really hinderers of the good, in that they retard the work of unity. For is not the Saviour's work one of uniting all in Himself by the work of His redemption? If a man has no sympathy with this work, it is because he himself is not in the line of Christ's movement. Christian service is not an arbitrary test of a man's goodness; it is vital and fundamental. That life which professes sympathy with Jesus Christ, and yet fails to move in the same direction with Him, is radically defective, if it be not a self-delusion. True service is the compulsion of life; without it, life is either absent or hibernating.

Levi's Feast. The advocates of asceticism and selfish seclusion, who are fond of advocating "the contemplative life," might, with benefit, study the example of Matthew, who, after he had, in response to Christ's call, "Follow Me," risen up and followed the Lord, "made him a great feast in his own house," and gathered there a "great company of publicans and of others that sat down with them" (Luke v. 27-32). Doubtless there was a strange mixture of people there, for Christ appears to have recognized that the censorious question of the Pharisees was not without justification in the character of some of the guests. Levi had, however, invited Jesus. He had not found in the Divine summons a call to desert his old friends until he had introduced Jesus to them. And "shady" as some of the visitors might be, we know what a sweet influence would flow from the presence of the Master, whose explanation of His acceptance of the invitation has given the world the keynote of the Redeemer's message and work. With these words in his heart, Matthew was not likely to seek a hermit's cell; for him there was his own life, into which Jesus had come; and the daily life of others, into which he had to take his Master.

The Church's Leakage.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THE leakage, real or supposed, great or small, from our churches, especially in the case of young people, has received considerable attention of late. It is well to mark the danger of playing with statistics in religious matters. They can never be trustworthy as tests of spiritual work.

Of course, there are figures so undisputed and so unmistakable in their significance that their evidence cannot be lightly put aside. Others may seem to be beyond question, as they represent hard facts; but either a meaning is read into them which they do not bear, or other facts are overlooked that materially alter their whole significance.

The complaint has long been that Nonconformist churches are continually losing the young people of their families, especially of those who have attained to higher social position. Perhaps the drifting has been stronger and more marked of late years. The point is one which needs to be examined, and, if possible, explained; and in order to reach any practical conclusion, it is necessary, in the first instance, to limit very narrowly the range of our inquiry. There is a very marked and wide distinction between any real or fancied decline in the spiritual efficiency of the Church, as compared with its work in the last generation, and this falling off of the children of those who have held high positions in our churches as "good men," in the Scriptural sense of that term.

PIETY NOT HEREDITARY.

The first remark, and one which needs to be strongly accentuated, though it is in itself sufficiently obvious, is that piety is not hereditary. The more truly spiritual any type of religion is, therefore, the less is it to be supposed that it will descend in regular succession from father to son. "One generation shall tell Thy wonderful works to another," but when that lesson has to be learned by each individual member of a generation separately, it is by no means certain that the child will always follow the example of the parent. Some families do seem to preserve a tradition of goodness, and where it is so, the influence may be expected to gather strength from generation to generation. But, even so, continuity cannot be insured, and at any point the chain may be broken. If it is to be preserved, it must be by the faith of each individual. Membership in a Nonconformist church does not belong to any man by right of descent or education. He may be the child of a pious ancestry which for generations has been faithful to the truth of Christ; but he is not, therefore, outside the sweep of the Saviour's own law, "Ye must be born again."

THE DEMANDS OF SOCIETY.

When it is once recognized that every Christian, to whatever church he may belong, must himself come to Christ, and by a personal act of faith himself become His disciple, the whole inquiry into any alleged decline assumes an entirely new character. The difficulty of remaining a conscientious Dissenter becomes greater with every step upward toward the charmed region of Society. It is not to be doubted that one who "loves greetings in the market-place" of Society must make sacrifices if he remains loyal to Dissent. Especially is this the case when a wealthy man, who has made his fortune in trade, migrates to some country district. He may have had no idea of abandoning his early principles, but he speedily finds that, if he will not do this, he must give up all idea of social intercourse with his neighbours. Is it wonderful that there are some who are unequal to the strain? I do not discuss here the equity of the state of things out of which this has grown. I simply note the result as one cause of the defections which we deplore. It may affect even some sincerely religious men who do not attach much value to differences about church polity. Much more is it likely to influence those whose Nonconformity does not possess its root in religious earnestness, and will never be strong and enduring unless deeply rooted in faith and spiritual experience.

The Outpoured Spirit.—4.

GOD'S IDEAL WITNESSES.

WHILE so much prayer is girdling the earth and going up to the God of Heaven for the revival of His people —"Wilt Thou not revive us again, that Thy people may rejoice in Thee?"—it cannot be inconsistent with the yearning of many to become His Spirit-filled witnesses, that we should consider His own pictorial vision of old-time witnesses and their work, given to the prophet Ezekiel in the land of the Chaldeans, by the river Chebar.

Out of the whirlwind of the northern armies and the fire of God's judgments came the likeness of a living creature, fourfold and yet one, a partaker of the Divine nature, with the forces and qualities of the lower creation—the lion's majesty and power, the ox's patient strength and labour, the eagle's keen perception and aspiring flight—added to the intelligence of man. They were of the colour of amber—like gold refined in the fire.

Above the firmament which was over their heads was the likeness of a throne, and the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it—the Man Christ Jesus—to be identified as the Angel of the Covenant by the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain. The oneness of the Head and His members is expressed by the identity of the symbols—the amber, the fire, and the brightness round about (Ezek. i., cp. 4, 5, with 26-28).

The living creatures may primarily represent God's elect servants and witnesses of the Jewish nation; for Christ Jesus, their prototype, was a Jew—made under the law to redeem them that were under the law; and His witnesses, the twelve, the seventy, and the hundred-and-twenty, were also Jews. But the Jewish nation is of the human race, and the Man Christ Jesus broke down the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile, to make in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace.

The vision received a primary illustration in the Jewish witnesses at and after Pentecost, when, out of the fires of persecution, like burnished gold out of the midst of fire, they went everywhere, like flashes of lightning, preaching the Word. And it may be more fully realized in millennial days, when Israel shall arise and shine, for her light has come; and they shall be the priests and ministers of Jehovah to the far-off lands and islands which have not heard His Name nor seen His glory.

But as the Gentile Church has been grafted into Israel's good olive-tree, there is no blessedness, no privilege, no responsibility, no ministry, possible to Israel, in the past or in the future, which is not possible (allowing for difference of dispensation) to every member of the Gentile Church, the Israel of God.

Let us therefore meditate upon this revealing vision of the living creatures, Spirit-filled. They possessed the desire and the power to rise heavenward; for "they four had their faces and their wings;" righteousness of walk and conduct; for "their feet were a straight foot."

They had the power which always accompanies righteousness; for "they had the hands of a Man under their wings on their four sides." Cp. Hab. iii. 4—"And He had horns coming out of His hand—[His pierced hand]; and there was the hiding of His power."

There was loving unity of motion; for "their wings were joined one to another, and kissed one another" (iii. 13, marg.). There was no overlapping, no interference with each other's work, no envy or jealousy of one another; but oneness and fixity of purpose, for "they went everyone straightforward." They had life in the Spirit, fulness of the Spirit, obedience to the Spirit; for "whithersoever the Spirit was to go, they went; thither was their spirit to go." They burned with love and shone as lights in the world; for "their appearance was like burning coals of fire and like the appearance of lamps."

With undeviating directness of aim, "they turned not" to the right hand nor to the left "when they went"; with instantaneous and irresistible execution, for "they ran and returned like the appearance of a flash of lightning;" doing all in the name of the Lord Jesus, for "whither the Head looked they followed it" (x. 11, 12), guided by his eye.

Even when silent, their every motion testified to Him who had redeemed them; for "the noise of their wings was like the noise of great waters, as the voice of the Almighty, the voice of speech, as the noise of a host." Hiding and denying themselves, with reverence toward their Lord, "when they stood before the throne they let down their wings." Beloved of the Lord Jesus, and having fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, they hearkened to the voice of his word; for "there was a voice from the firmament that was over their heads when they stood and had let down their wings." They were identified with, and carried into execution, the high and dreadful purposes of the high and lofty One who inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; for "Behold, one wheel upon the earth beside the living creatures . . . as it were a wheel within a wheel . . . As for their rings, they were high and dreadful . . . and when the living creatures went, the wheels went beside them . . . and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up . . . for the Spirit of the living creature was in the wheels." Their whole body was full of light; for "their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had" (x. 12).

When Ezekiel by the river Chebar and John in the Isle of Patmos ate the roll given to each of them, they found it honey-sweet in the mouth but bitter afterwards. Ezekiel's ecstatic vision of the living creatures may well have filled him with holy joy; but when he found himself called to minister to a people of a hard forehead and of a stiff heart, and the Spirit lifted him up and took him away, he went in bitterness, in the hot anger of his spirit; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him.

He sat for seven days astonied among the sinful people, for he was one of the same nation. He must eat defiled bread by weight and drink water by measure, and thus be a sign unto them. He must lie 390 days on his left side and forty days on his right side, and symbolically bear the iniquity of Israel and Judah, a day for a year of their mighty sins. His tongue should cleave to the roof of his mouth, and he should not be a reprover to them, though his heart was bursting to tell them of the grace against which they sinned, and the love which they outraged by their wicked abominations.

Is there even in the Divine literature a more pathetic passage than this?—

> Also the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, "Son of man, behold I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke; yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down. Sigh, but not aloud [be silent], make no mourning for the dead; bind thy headtire upon thee; put thy shoes upon thy feet; and cover not thy lips, nor eat the bread of men." So I spake unto the people; and at even my wife died; and in the morning I did as I was commanded.

Now he has arrested the attention of the people, and they ask him, "Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so?" Now his mouth is opened, and he is no more dumb.

If we are Spirit-filled, we must suffer with those to whom we are sent. We must be a sign unto them. To see that their sin brings sorrow upon us will touch their hearts. How shall we comfort them who are in any sorrow, except we have known sorrow in which we ourselves have been comforted of God? How shall we bring others to obedience unless we, like our Lord, have learned obedience by the things which we have suffered?

And not only will the Spirit-filled learn sympathy with men, but sympathy with God. For the sufferings endured by Ezekiel were signs of the agonies of God. They had made Him to serve with their sins. He was pressed under them as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves. The desire of His eyes, the beloved Son who was in the bosom of the Father, must be taken away at a stroke. By no symbolic endurance must He bear away man's iniquity, but by the sacrifice of Himself, while angels desire to look into the mystery of God's strange work, His act, His strange act, when the hosts of God march against the Son of His love as against the enemies at Mount Perazim, and the great hailstones of Divine wrath were cast down from heaven, as at Gibeon, not upon Amorites, whose iniquity was full, but upon the Holy One, the Word made flesh, the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, who revealed Him to men, none of whom had seen God at any time (Isa. xxviii. 21, and refs.).

To those who thirst, and come to Jesus and drink; who, having been baptized by one Spirit into one body, drink of that one Spirit; who are drunken, not with wine wherein is excess, but with the Spirit wherein is no excess—all this and far more will be revealed; and they will know the honey sweetness of the roll that they have eaten, and its bitterness when digested; for they who fully follow the Man of Sorrows will be men of sorrow, until they drink of the river of His pleasures at the right hand of God. The Missionary Association.

THE Missionary Association continues to receive letters from missionaries in many lands expressing warm sympathy with its objects and hearty appreciation of its plans. The following extracts are typical of many communications:—

From Victoria, B.C.:—"Here we are face to face with a condition of things in which an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit is our only hope, and we are sure that we are not forgotten."

From India:—"It would be a privilege to associate myself with others who are seeking the communion of, and empowerment through, the Holy Spirit. True enough it is that there is very much work done, and little fruit shown for it. Let us cease from ourselves, and cultivate the acquaintance of Him who 'searcheth the deep things of God.' He will show us God's own idea of service."

From Portugal:—"I am heartily in sympathy with your object. We do, indeed, need a fuller baptism for service, as well as for personal consecration, so impossible without the help of the Lord the Spirit."

United meetings for missionaries are held by the Association at the Police Institute, Adam Street, Strand, every Wednesday, at four o'clock.

Conference of Evangelists.—A meeting of evangelists for prayer and conference is to be held at the Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate Street, E.C., on the afternoon of Wednesday, November 19. Mr. G. E. Morgan, M.A., will take the chair at two o'clock. The address at the Noon Prayer-Meeting on that day will be given by Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B.

Home Missions.

The Manchester Mission.

THE sixteenth anniversary of the Manchester Wesleyan Mission was celebrated on Tuesday, when a special sermon was preached in the Central Hall in the morning, and two influential meetings took place in the Free Trade Hall, afternoon and evening. To the great joy of the workers an encouraging report of the year's operations—spiritual and philanthrophic—was presented. Among many items which stand out in this interesting record, one fact appeals with arresting eloquence, viz., that in four years, after making full allowance for losses by removal, death, and other causes, there has been a net gain of over 2,000 in church membership.

It is quite in harmony with the history of the Mission that, along with this growth in church membership, there should be a corresponding increase in the number of voluntary workers. They now number 1,500. The Mission has largely depended upon its voluntary workers for stewardships, and to help in various forms of aggressive effort and visitation, and every convert is taught from the outset to be a helper.

An unmistakable evidence of the deep spiritual life at the centre of things is the fact that thirty-three prayer meetings are held every week. And it is here that the members gain strength and courage for their excessively difficult tasks in winning men and women, debased and enslaved by sin, to a concern for their soul's salvation.

REACHING THE LOWEST.

Seeing that there are depths much lower than those represented in the congregations at the Central Hall and other centres, the efforts of a large section of the members are devoted in this direction. They hold their open-air services by night and by day; also meetings in lodging-houses, where the homeless outcast and the waif of all classes are to be found. These are not casual services, held at odd times and places, without method or purpose. They are planned, officered, and prepared for; are followed by the prayer-meeting, inquiry-room, and organized pastoral visitation; and hold precisely the same relation to the large centres as the village chapel services hold to their respective circuit towns on a Methodist plan. Here again progress is noted. The open-air services have increased to thirty-four weekly, and the lodging-house meetings to thirty.

SOME SIGNIFICANT FEATURES.

Pastoral visitation is regarded as one of the most significant features of the Mission. Every week more than 6,000 homes are visited by the ministerial staff and bands of trained voluntary workers, and the visitors are the friends of the people—often their only friends. With the addition of new centres and the breaking up of fresh ground there has been, necessarily, an increase in the membership of the staff. The meeting on Tuesday mornings at Central Hall, over which that marvellous organizer, Rev. S. F. Collier, presides, has grown to formidable proportions. The staff numbers thirty-five, besides assistants at the homes and refuges.

It is only natural that a work which deals so helpfully and at so many points with the most pressing social problems of the day should arrest the attention of the authorities in the city, and it is gratifying to find that such notice is taking a more and more practical form. It is increasingly a habit among the charitably-disposed families of Manchester to appeal to the Mission for assistance in the often difficult duties of benevolence.

A perusal of the annual report reveals many encouraging facts, not the least important being that the properties of the Mission have increased to an astonishing extent; and while on every hand the organizations are thriving, the greatest advances recently made are in connection with the social work. The Shelters, Homes, and Labour Yard have proved to be perfect instruments for doing some of the most difficult work known to Christian philanthropy. Another noticeable feature is the development of efforts among the children, and some of the Sunday Schools have an extraordinary attendance. Special attention is given in separate schools to the poorest children, the waifs of the streets, the desolate little ones of courts and alleys.

The Mission is, above everything else, distinctively spiritual in its purpose, and no one who has followed its development will fail to see that its success is due to the fact that it has been true to its aim. Its growth is the result of adaptation to new conditions, and the best testimony to the solidity of the work is seen in the homes of the people, their habits of reverence and devotion, and their growing love for God and His Word. The headquarters of the work are at Central Hall, which is a veritable hive of spiritual activity.

"The Bridge of Hope."

IN the threefold undertaking of rescuing the fallen, sheltering the homeless, and receiving and training little girls who are found in positions fraught with moral danger, Miss Steer quietly but steadfastly continues her labours of love at the well-known "Bridge of Hope," in East London.

In her annual report, which is at once fascinating and pathetic, Miss Steer gives some striking examples of rescue, of which the following are typical:—

The tale told by T.B. (sent to us by one of the girls who years ago was in the Refuge, but is now respectably married) was piteous:—"I have nowhere to go. I have been selling greens on a barrow, and one night when I only took home a 'tanner,' my mother gave me a hiding and sent me off. Please take me in." This child needs more than a little training before she can be trusted with the best china; and when mistresses apply for servants, and we say we have none ready, they must not be hard on us.

E. F. could not get on with her stepmother. When she came to us, fourteen years old, she was ill, and dirty, and sullen. Her stepmother, on the other hand, said she could do nothing with her, and she must go to ruin if she would. To-day she is doing well in good service.

PROGRESS AND ENCOURAGEMENT.

The annual meeting, held on Tuesday, November 4, afforded a welcome opportunity for friends to hear of the year's progress.

Mr. J. E. Mathieson, who presided, said that for twenty-six years Miss Steer has laboured in a difficult work. "We praise God for her long continuance in well-doing, for the women and girls she has rescued, and particularly for the important and growing preventive work."

The operations, including the rescue and shelter department, the Training Home for young girls, and the Children's Homes at Chingford, were explained by Miss Steer, who referred to the changed character of the district around the Betts Street institutions. It has been largely taken possession of by the Jews—harmless neighbours enough, and not nearly so given to drinking as the Gentiles. There is more poverty but less vice. On this account the work is increasingly of a preventive character.

Recent months have seen a change in the character of the training. Hitherto laundry work has been undertaken for outside people; but this, although a source of income, is to be given up in favour of a more complete course of instruction in household duties. The task of training tiresome girls, who have come very near to the brink of a sinful career, is an arduous one; but it is aimed to develop them into useful women. The larger work at Chingford is carried on quietly but well. Many of the girls are turning out creditably, and Miss Steer lately had the pleasure of presenting gifts to those who, after passing through, have remained in their first situations for two and three years respectively.

Mr. W. F. A. Archibald, who followed, said that it is according to the principles taught by the parable of the Good Samaritan, that, with warm, sympathetic hearts the devoted ladies of the "Bridge of Hope" carry on their valuable ministry. The Preventive Branch is of special importance. A Dartmoor warder recently said that he knew of no prisoner reclaimed through prison discipline. "No," said the warder, "you must begin at the other end of life, with the young people, and prevent them from going down." This is what Miss Steer is doing.

STRENUOUS STRUGGLES IN THE SLUMS.

After a few telling words from Mr. R. W. Wilkinson, Miss Jones, who for years has assisted Miss Steer, gave some interesting accounts of adventures while seeking the lost.

On one occasion, pursuing a woman who had fallen back into drinking, Miss Jones entered a public-house and warned the barman that he had no right to serve an intoxicated woman. The barman instantly whisked away the woman's glass, denied that he had served her, and had both her and Miss Jones turned immediately into the street. "But," added Miss Jones with a glow of joy, "I got her safely into our Home."

Another case was that of a woman of loose life who, after being helped, ran off, but returned next morning saying, "I don't know how to look at you. I've been walking the streets for hours, for I hadn't the courage to come." This woman was helped into a situation, and is doing well. A third story was of a Scottish lassie who wandered from home, came to London, and by the providence of God was guided to the "Bridge of Hope." After telling many falsehoods she ultimately admitted the truth. Her father came to London, and his erring child was restored to him. Miss Jones had remarked on the wonderful way in which the girl had come. "Ah!" said the father, "I was praying all the time for my poor girl; that's why she came to you."

Encouraging words were added by Mr. Theodore Howard and Rev. J. F. Cummings. The former recalled a visit to Venice, and spoke of the famous Bridge of Sighs. "Its name reminds us of this institution; but while that leads from palace to prison, this leads from the prison of sin towards the Palace of the King, and is well named 'The Bridge of Hope.'"

"Do They Stand?"

THIS question is often asked about rescue cases, and there is undoubtedly an impression with some people that such work is not encouraging nor are the results permanent. The workers happily know that, while there are some failures, very many are permanently uplifted, as the following will show.

An interesting incident occurred at the Norwood Home of the Rescue Society the other day. A respectable woman of middle age called and asked for someone who had ceased to be matron there many years, and long since had passed to her rest. When told she was no longer living there, she burst into tears and could with difficulty control herself. Early the next day she called on the secretary, and then told her story. Twenty-six years ago she had been an inmate of the Home. After fifteen months she had been placed in a situation, where she had remained until the death of her mistress, who bequeathed to her a small legacy. Eventually she married, and emigrated to New Zealand. On her way to America with her husband and family she had come for a short stay in England, and one of her first calls had been at the Home, to which, as she said, she owed all she now is.

The previous week an old woman called to see the secretary. She was rescued by the Society in 1854, and during all these years has kept in touch with the workers. She is now a grandmother, and a happy, contented Christian woman, but never forgets to whom she is indebted for the helping hand in time of need.

Many such stories could be recorded of the present happy state of early inmates. There are now a large number of girls and young women in the seven Homes, and it is encouraging to know that many have been brought to the knowledge of the Saviour. Unhappily the receipts are far below the expenditure, though the greatest economy is practised. The secretary is Mr. C. Stuart Thorpe, 79, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

The Open-Air Mission.

It was an enthusiastic company that assembled at Exeter Hall on Thursday last. The occasion was the autumnal re-union of supporters, members, and friends of the Open-Air Mission, and the proceedings were another proof of the unity of spirit and purpose which unmistakably characterizes the work of the society. The Mission is careful to adapt its operations to the conditions of each recurring season of the year, and the ancient fairs of our land have again proved fruitful fields for the autumn endeavours. Many who took part on Thursday evening were fresh from the scenes of labour, and spoke from full and thankful hearts of what they had both seen and heard.

"BESIDE ALL WATERS."

In taking their stand at race-meetings and fairs, the evangelists have enjoyed unique opportunities of warning men and women to consider their ways, and it has been the unspeakable joy of these sowers of the Seed to witness this season the working of the Holy Spirit on streams of giddy and heedless seekers of pleasure, in a greater measure than ever before in the history of the movement. One after another bore testimony to this at the gathering on Thursday.

A brief word of encouragement was given to the evangelists by the chairman, Major H. P. Treeby. Reading from Col. i., he pointed out that the messengers of the Gospel could only be drawn nearer to each other as they were brought nearer to God, and which would enable them to work more strenuously in the future than in the past. He enlarged upon seven thoughts prominent in this prayer of the Apostle: (1) A plea that they might be filled with the knowledge of God's will; (2) walking worthy of the Lord; (3) showing fruitfulness; (4) increasing in the knowledge of God; (5) strengthened with all might; (6) patience and long-suffering; (7) joyfulness and giving of thanks.

Accounts of recent efforts were given by a number of the workers. Mr. F. J. Rayner described a five-weeks' mission at Douglas. "One of the first encouragements we had was at the opening meeting, when one of the crowd requested us to sing No. 505 in "Songs and Solos," stating that the singing of the hymn had led to his conversion at our gatherings twelve months before." At another service a man, who had attended a number of the gatherings, made his way to the front at the close and knelt at the penitent form in tears. The worker who dealt with him found that at one time he had been an open-air preacher, and had won many to Christ, but had ultimately fallen through giving way to drink. Being convicted of sin, he definitely sought and found restoration. At Castletown an unusual experience was that of preaching to some 200 or 300 occupants of char-a-bancs, who had requested the drivers to "pull up" at the scene of the gathering.

AT THE SEASIDE.

Cheering news of the seaside missions on the east coast was brought by Mr. Walter Goff. At Great Yarmouth the work is no longer an experiment, but has become firmly established. One of the greatest joys of visiting the town is found in meeting those who have been blessed of God through His servants working in connection with the society.

Efforts at Doncaster Races were explained by Mr. Luther Jupp, who said the Mission always aimed at working in harmony with, and not in opposition to, local authorities. Application was made for a public space, and the next morning a portion of the square in the heart of the town was marked "Church Mission!" The meetings were held here each race-day till noon, when a move was made to the course, and an aggressive campaign was carried on. In spite of many drawbacks the work prospered, and it was good to see so many stepping forward out of the crowds of betting men to accept converts' cards. For the first time a number of the preachers visited Ayr Races, and Mr. William Towell spoke of some interesting cases of conversion among those who heard the message of the Cross while bent on pleasure and sin, including one striking instance of a man saved on the brink of suicide.

Addressing himself to the workers, Rev. H. B. Macartney offered some earnest and heartfelt counsel. Quoting John v. 35 (R.V.)—"He was the lamp that burneth and shineth"—the speaker made an impressive application of the words. The lamp is not sufficient of itself, there must be oil, fire, and constant trimming. So in order to be a successful winner of souls there must be not only the confession of sin, but the filling of the Holy Ghost.

AT PROVINCIAL FAIRS.

Describing efforts made at other centres during the present autumn, Mr. Frank Cockrem, the assiduous secretary, writes:—

"Six evangelists of the society laboured together at Peterborough Fair, being warmly welcomed by a large meeting at Queen Street Baptist Church. Many prayers were offered, and much sympathetic interest was shown. At the bridge, which thousands pass over on their way to the Fair, morning, afternoon, and evening services were held each day. Great numbers were arrested and listened all the time. Intense and earnest attention was given at every meeting. A large number of 'converts' cards' were taken by anxious ones, and many truly received Christ as their Saviour.

"Proceeding thence to Nottingham 'Goose' Fair and races, the people came readily to our meetings. A most remarkable experience was granted on the racecourse, where the Gospel had never before been proclaimed. We were not allowed to take our banner or harmonium on to the course; we told forth the glorious message of salvation alternately in short addresses. In doing this we had to confront some 5,000 betting-men, who were all in a frenzy of gambling. But the spirit of God arrested many, who stayed their proceedings to listen and to look. The Inspector of Police afterwards assured us that he had been praying for us all the time! God heard and answered.

"Sunday night in Nottingham Market Place was splendid. Quite 1,000 people assembled, and not only did a large number come forward to receive 'converts' cards,' but many remained after the meeting to be personally spoken with.

"Hull Fair, the next function to be visited, was a time long to be remembered, although the first meetings were rather marred by rain and tempest. Still, many of those who came and heard the Gospel were saved. On Sunday afternoon crowds gathered round the evangelists, who occupied a show stage, and among them a number of Norwegians, who sang heartily with us. The morning prayer-meetings at the Y.W.C.A. were much blessed, and several of the young women were our earnest helpers. The closing meetings held at the Monument were most powerful.

"A number of the evangelists laboured for several days at Leicester Fair, where there was a great opportunity, especially on the Sunday, when three services were held from the stage of a show. Two thousand working-men listened spellbound at these three wonderful open-air gatherings, and many among them have since signified their definite acceptance of the Saviour."

Miss Mason's House of Rest.

On Friday evening last, Rev. A. W. Evans, co-pastor of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, addressed a very large gathering at the House of Rest, St. John's Wood. He took the place of Rev. S. A. Selwyn, vicar of Trinity Church, Hampstead, who is suffering from influenza. Using the 131st Psalm as the basis of his address, Mr. Evans referred to the restlessness, and the fussiness, and the want of submission which spoils the lives of so many Christians. He enlarged upon the need of a "weaned" spirit, the cultivation of a quiet and restful mind, a will submissive to the Divine will, and a calm, trustful dependence upon God. This is an essential to the enjoyment of God's richest spiritual blessings, and the graces of the Holy Spirit. Colonel Oldham presided, and subsequently spoke upon three "withouts" in Hebrews—"without sin," "without blood," "without faith."

Bulford Camp, Salisbury Plain.

The dedicatory service of the Wesley Hall and Soldiers' Home was conducted by Rev. Marshall Hartley, President-elect of the Wesleyan Conference, on Friday last week. There was a fair attendance of civilians and soldiers and their wives in the hall. Mr. Hartley gave an appropriate address on "First Fruits," urging consecration, not of part, but of the whole. At the tea, held in the refreshment hall, over 300 sat down, taxing the resources of the Home to the utmost. In the interval between the tea and the evening gathering, Wesley Hall was filled with soldiers. Hymns were sung, and short addresses were given by Rev. A. W. Allen, Senior Wesleyan Chaplain, and Rev. W. L. Brinswell, Portsmouth Garrison.

Later on in the evening, a gathering was presided over by Lieut.-Col. J. W. Stirling, commanding the 24th Brigade Division, Royal Artillery, who expressed his appreciation for work such as these Homes render to all. Over 400 soldiers and many of their wives and children were present, and the hall was simply crowded to its utmost capacity. Rev. James Fletcher made a statement showing that the total cost of the premises was £2,859 13s. 7d., towards which £2,318 13s. 9d. was secured, leaving a balance of £540 12s. 10d. to be raised.

Scottish Notes.

During the winter months missionaries on furlough, and other Christian workers who need rest and change, are received at the Y.W.C.A. Home, Kirn, on very moderate terms. Inquiries should be addressed to the Lady Superintendent, Auchencraig, Kirn, Argyllshire. The Home, which is beautifully situated in its own grounds, and overlooks the Firth of Clyde, has hitherto been closed in winter.

At a recent meeting of the National Bible Society of Scotland, the Evangelical Society of Geneva reported the sale on the Bible Society's behalf—chiefly in France—of 434 Bibles, 6,953 Testaments, and 2,752 portions—in all, 10,139 Scriptures. It was reported that a new Society had been formed in Rome, entitled, "The Society of St. Jerome, for the diffusion of the Holy Gospels," with a Cardinal for President and the Vatican Librarian for secretary, its object being to issue editions of the Gospels in Italian.

In the annual report of the Faith Missions, Mr. J. G. Govan says:—"Scotland has had ninety-eight missions, and when we add that the West Highlands and Islands have had thirty-eight of these, which is, by far, in excess of any other district, it will be seen at once why our figures should show a decrease in some points. As an example of these missions, we may mention the Island of Muck, where the total population was under forty, making large meetings an impossibility. Praise the Lord, however, there was large blessing! Again, when we say that nineteen missions have been held in the counties of Perth, Sterling, and Inverness, it does not look much; but when it is remembered that that mainly means hard work in the highlands of Perthshire, with very scattered populations, long, lonely walks over hill roads, and ofttimes but a handful able to gather in the meetings, it will be manifest that the very object of the Mission in its inception is being blessedly realized. Forfar and Fife have had twenty missions, and in these old battlefields it has once more been a feature that small, dark, hard places have had the blessed Gospel carried into them—with varying success, indeed, some receiving the message gladly, while others have stolidly refused to hear. The Lothians and border counties, and a few in other parts, account for the remaining twenty-one missions. Some blessed trophies have been won, though in some cases there has been that strange hardness which characterized some missions farther north."

Elise Home of Rest, Sutton.—Having recently visited this institution, Miss E. Ellison writes in appreciative terms of the useful ministry which it fulfils. "Being a small Home, receiving as a rule only nine, family life is well sustained, not that of an institution. The two weekly Bible readings are a means of real spiritual help, and much appreciated by all. Those who carry on the work do it in the fear of the Lord, acknowledging Christ as the Head of the Home, and aiming to meet the need of His weak and suffering members, whose means are limited. I cannot speak too highly of the restful and enjoyable change afforded by a stay in the Home."

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, November 16. 1 Kings iv.

THIS chapter describes the great prosperity of Israel under the reign of Solomon.

The sacred scribe first enumerates the high officials of his court, and among them it is pleasant to notice the sons of men who had served David faithfully, such as Azariah, the son of Zadok, and Zabud, the son of Nathan. As the taxes in the East are paid in grain and kind, it was needful to have officials entrusted with the collection and transference to Jerusalem, for the King's use, of the produce of the land.

The expressions employed to describe the number, happiness, and peace of the nation are very expressive (see vv. 20, 24, 25), foreshadowing the blessed days when Christ will be recognised as King of all the world.

Here, too, is Solomon "in all his glory," in the width of his empire, in the bounty of the provision for his household, in his army, in his wisdom and knowledge, in his widespread influence over all lands (34). But as we turn from him to the Carpenter of Nazareth, who had not where to lay His head, who found His close friends among the poor, and who ultimately laid down His life a ransom for men, who does not feel that, altogether apart from His Divine Sonship, His was the nobler ideal, and the more useful career? Probably Solomon himself would have admitted this, but it is to be remembered that He has set us an example that we should follow His steps. "A greater than Solomon" is here; let us hear Him.

MONDAY, November 17. 1 Kings v.

The Temple of God was built in times of peace. "The Lord had given rest on every side; there was neither adversary nor evil occurrent." This is very significant. It is true, first, of the Church at large. When the Church throughout all Judea and Galilee had peace, it was edified; and as it walked in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort (paraclesis) of the Holy Ghost (Paraclete), it was multiplied (Acts ix. 31). The days of peace are also those in which the inner life thrives. This is brought out remarkably in 1 Thess. v. 23, and in Heb. xiii. 20.

In these passages we learn that when the peace of God sentinels the heart without, the God of Peace is able to do His work within (Phil. iv. 7-9). God is not in the earthquake, nor the storm, but in the still small voice. We must be still before Him, if we would be in the fittest condition for His hands to perfect that which concerneth us.

It was good that Hiram and his Tyrians should be associated with the servants of Solomon, in hewing the immense blocks of stone, some thirty feet in length and six feet in breadth, which still lie at the foundations of the ancient Temple site; and in cutting the cedars and fir-trees which were needed for the woodwork. May it not have been intended to teach that the Gentiles would be associated with the Jews in that one holy Temple, which through the ages is growing unto a habitation of God through the Spirit (Eph. ii. 21, 22)? In Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision nor uncircumcision.

The treaty between Solomon and Hiram was eminently wise, since their peoples were so different—the one pastoral, the other commercial. So we receive from one another; and it is wise for Peter and John to make close friendship, and to go together up the steps to the Gate Beautiful!

TUESDAY, November 18. 1 Kings vi.

In the Temple the main design of the Tabernacle was perpetuated by its division into holy and most holy place; but there were several additions. For instance, there was a lofty porch in front of the Temple, beneath which the priests passed to the entrance. Also, on the three other sides were rooms, built one above the other to three storeys, which slightly increased in size, as the walls of the sanctuary against which they rested tapered slightly inwards. These rooms were probably used for the storage of various articles required for the holy service, for the instruments of music, and for the priests' vestments (Neh. xiii. 4, &c.).

The caution of vv. 11-13 may have been required, lest the people should suppose that the erection of this permanent Temple in their midst necessarily involved the permanent presence of God. Jehovah made it clear that His gracious help was dependent on the moral and spiritual character of Solomon and his people. Only so long as they walked in His statutes and kept His commandments, would He dwell in their midst. We also may have God's presence in our lives, filling the temple of our being with majesty, purity, and beauty; but there is one condition—ritual will not be enough; outward worship not enough; liberality to the poor, and generosity in Christian enterprise, not enough. There must be love, faith, obedience.

The house arose in silence (7). As in nature, so in grace, God's greatest work is wrought in the hushed stillness. When you think that your life is most stationary, it is possible that you are making most progress. Be quiet, and entrust the fulfilment of His ideal to the great Architect. The result may be long in being realized, but it will come—first the stone, hewn with difficulty in the quarry, then the cedar and olivewood, but lastly the gold, and the cherubim, and the holy oracle (vv. 22, 23).

WEDNESDAY, November 19. 1 Kings vii.

Solomon's house took almost twice as long to build as the Temple, because there was not the same urgency for it. His house and that for the Queen were probably built around large open courts, which stood, after the manner of the East, one at each side of the central hall where public business was transacted. This must have been of noble proportions, and so much cedar was used for it that it was called the House of the Forest of Lebanon. We do not know where this great palace stood, but from the profuse use of great hewn stones in its foundation, it would appear that, like the area for the Temple, the level on which it was situated had been raised from some deep depression either in the city or in its immediate neighbourhood.

Hiram was remarkably gifted. All the genius of Tyre was inherited from his father, but on his mother's side he was of the tribe of Naphtali. The twin pillars (v. 15-22) were made of the brass taken from the King of Zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 8, 9). Each would stand to a height of 40ft. Their names were symbolical, and indicated their strength and stability. Wreaths of chain-work were hung from the capitals, and beautiful ornaments of lily-work adorned the head of these noble columns.

The molten sea was for the ablutions of the priests. It was an immense circular vase, 17½ft. diameter, 8¾ft. in depth, and held 20,000 gallons of water. Its brim was of lily work, and it stood on brazen oxen. Besides this, there were ten trucks, or four-wheeled conveyances, for the transport of portable vases. All this work was wrought in the valley of the Jordan, where the soil provided the sand, &c., needed in such operations. With what care these items are specified; but nothing is too minute or insignificant for God to notice, when our work is prompted by desires for His glory (Matt. xxvi. 10, 13).

THURSDAY, November 20. 1 Kings viii.

The Temple had been finished some eleven months when it was dedicated. The delay probably was due to the desirability of waiting for the next year, which was a jubilee year. The occasion chosen was the Feast of Tabernacles, when the people gathered from the whole land to dwell in booths. With solemn pomp the ark was borne from its temporary resting-place to its abiding place. How appropriate Psalm cxxxii. was for such an occasion! And how comforted Solomon must have been when he saw the Shekinah-cloud settle down like God's blessing and sign of approval! Thus was the first Tabernacle consecrated for its holy purposes (Ex. xl. 34). It was as though the Divine King had taken up His residence, constituting the Temple His palace.

Solomon's attitudes are specially noticed by the sacred scribe. First he seems to have stood with rapt awe watching the descent of the cloud of the Divine Presence, and reassuring the affrighted priests as they fled before its awful splendour (12, 13). Then he turned to the mighty throng of people who were gathered in the outer court, recapitulating the promises which were being fulfilled (14, &c.). Finally he ascended the scaffold, which had been erected for the purpose, in front of the brazen altar, first standing and then kneeling (22-54, and 2 Chron. vi. 13). It was a sublime prayer, touching on the seven possible cases in which special reference would be made to that sacred place. Then he arose, and with outstretched hands blessed the people.

FRIDAY, November 21. 1 Kings ix.

Surely this second appearance was on the night following the dedication of the Temple; because so much of the gracious words spoken by the Lord are in direct answer to Solomon's prayer. And there was evidently a special reason for inserting these solemn warning words in this chapter, the close of which tells of the vast prosperity of his realm, and the influx of foreign people with their tastes and luxuries, that it might be clear that he did not launch forth on this flowing tide of prosperity unwarned. So it is always; there are ever warning voices that put us on our guard. The voice of our Saviour says, "Satan hath desired to have you . . . but I have prayed for thee."

The cities which Solomon gave to Hiram, were situate in the north of Palestine; but he refused them on account of their inland situation, which made them unsuitable for a maritime people. So Solomon satisfied his ally in some other way, and putting a colony of Hebrews into these cities, kept them under his government (2 Chron. viii. 2).

Solomon was a great builder, and for this purpose employed vast numbers of the Canaanites as slaves, compelling them to do the drudgery, whilst Israelites filled the higher and more honourable posts. Millo was the key to the fortifications of Jerusalem; Hazor and Megiddo, Baalath (Baalbek) and Tadmor, guarded the northern frontier; on the extreme south he had navies that sailed as far as India, and returned laden with £2,604,000. These were the midsummer days of Israel, which will return when the chosen people repent and God shall send unto them Christ as their Deliverer (see Acts iii. 20-21). Oh that Israel would hear the summons, "Arise, shine, for thy Light is come"! (Isa. lx. 1.)

SATURDAY, November 22. 1 Kings x.

Sheba, to the Jewish mind, was at the ends of the earth (Matt. xii. 42). It was probably in Abyssinia, toward the south of the Red Sea. The Queen brought a most munificent present, of produce, of £700,000 in gold, and of sweet-scented trees which Solomon used for musical instruments and for stairs in his temple and palace (2 Chron. ix. 11). But her heart was set on plying him with hard questions.

Let us approach Him who is greater than Solomon, coming from a far country, bringing Him our gifts, the faith, love, and loyalty of our hearts, and especially laying before Him all thosequestions which have perplexed us. He will answer them, not as the world does, for He will give us Himself, who is the true Light; and to have Him is to know all things. God gives us a knowledge of holy things, by giving us the things themselves. The Bible, some one says, does not teach us philosophy, but makes us philosophers. Besides answering our questions, Christ will give of His royal bounty.

The wealth which poured into the kingdom of Israel during those golden years was amazing. The imagination is oppressed with the weight of imagery. Let us use such words to help us to understand "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and let us remember to claim our share in His abundance, because only as we receive the abundance of grace, and possess our possessions, shall we be able to reign.

(See Cartoon, page 16).

THE cartoon which we publish this week from our American contemporary, Puck, is no baseless calumny on the Roman Catholic attitude to the question of education. The New World has afforded during the last generation many illustrations of the fact which the nations of Europe learned long before through bitter experience—that whatever professions may be made to suit special exigencies, the policy and essential character of Romanism remain the same as in the days of the "Holy" Inquisition and the martyr fires of Smithfield.

In several of the South American republics clericalism is dominant, with the utterly deplorable results in educational and public affairs to which attention is so often called in our columns. But in the United States the Romish priest has not yet gained undisputed sway, and every species of intrigue and chicanery is called into requisition to secure the object of which he never loses sight. Over and over again in different States of the Union the course of events depicted in our cartoon has been witnessed. By plausible reasoning the baby tiger has been introduced under the guise of usefulness combined with harmlessness; but a footing having been once secured, growth is rapid, and the pet animal becomes the relentless life-destroyer.

English Protestants have to a large extent been disarmed by the quiet methods through which Romanists and Romanisers have for many years been endeavouring to gain their ends, forgetful that the years of foundation-laying are quite as important as those of placing the corner-stones or erecting the turrets of a building. The Education Bill has come suddenly on those only who were not fully alive to the workings of clericalism. Even when it was introduced into Parliament, the attempt was still maintained to mask the batteries turned on our Protestant liberties. For instance, from many platforms, as well as in the House of Commons itself, the statement was made that the Bill was as much in the interests of Nonconformists as of Churchmen or Roman Catholics. The acceptance by the Government of the Kenyon-Slaney addition to Clause 8 has, however, done much to reveal the truth.

Now the Church Times, in angry disappointment, declares that Mr. Balfour has "flung a gross insult in the face of the clergy." No change is made in the arrangement by which the clergy and their friends will still have a two-thirds majority in the management of their schools; all that is complained of is that religious education is placed under the control of the governing body in the same manner as that which is secular, so called. The ecclesiastics who alone regarded the Bill with satisfaction will trust none, even of their own communion, save priests, to have a voice in the direction of religious instruction. A Romish priest declared at Bayswater less than three weeks ago that the Government was anxious to do all it could to meet the wishes of those whom he represented, the only difficulty in the way being the fierce Nonconformist opposition. Taking up the same note, the Church Times says:—"Such is the treatment the clergy have received from the Prime Minister, who, as they were credulous enough to imagine, would prove their friend." It would be interesting to know how the Prime Minister himself regards this candour.

All pretence having been thrown aside, the position of the High Church party is precisely that of the Romanists. Preaching at St. Peter's R. C. Church, Broad Street, Birmingham, on October 19, Father Nicholas Ward said:—

It is the business of the Church to save souls. This charge was entrusted to her by God. No power on earth can take it from her, or lawfully prevent her from doing all that it demands. The charge implies the right to tell every man what is right and what is wrong. Consequently, it belongs to the Church, and to her alone, to tell parents whether any one system of education is right and lawful, or whether it is wrong and therefore forbidden. And as the Church has the right to legislate in matters that bear on the salvation of souls, she has the right to forbid Catholi parents to send their children to certain schools; and the parents who refuse to obey such a command resist lawful authority, and, in the words of the Apostle St. Paul, "purchase damnation for themselves."

Turning to the public school arrangement, Father Ward added that "as a proper system of education for her own children the Church refuses to accept it;" and it would simplify matters very much for the future if politicians would accept this plain declaration.

The state of affairs in Ireland is satisfactory to Romanists. But what that is Mr. M. J. McCarthy has told us in his book, "Priests and People in Ireland." Let us, however, quote instead Father Anthony, O.S.F.C., in Franciscan Annals for the current month:—

The National schools, it is true, are nominally undenominational, yet, to all intents and purposes, the majority of them are Catholic. They are attended by Catholic children, staffed by Catholic teachers, managed by Catholic priests, and, outside the hours of secular instruction, are made use of for teaching the Catholic religion.

This, then, is the ideal of "undenominationalism," presumably also of "voluntaryism" in schools, in the eyes of the priests, and our people should know it. We and our readers have other names for it. Unless we wish to be ruthlessly crushed under the paw of this tiger, we must deal with it before it gains the mastery over us and our children. As the years have passed the ferocious beast has grown till it is now assuming the proportions indicated in the main figure of the cartoon. Let us recognize before God that the Education Bill is one of the instruments employed in the murderous work of wronging the rising generations and sowing the seed of future distress and sorrow in our homes. The cartoon is eighteen years old; and expresses what has been going on for a much longer period. Our fathers feared Roman Catholicism more than we do, not because they were more timid, but because they knew the enemy better.

MR. VARLEY'S EXPOSURE.

The direct relationship between Rome and the Education Bill, framed and introduced at the instance of the Anglo-Catholic party, has been clearly stated, published, and sent in the form of a letter by post to every member of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The author, Mr. Henry Varley (who has just returned from the United States), has brought with him much valuable information, proving conclusively that Romanism has been at the bottom of the long and strenuous conflict maintained not only against the Public School system of the United States, but against the Civil Government of the great Republic itself. The Public System of Education, with its Primary, Secondary, and Technical departments, is working splendidly, and has brought the great mass of the youth of the United States to the front rank among the nations of the earth.

The contrast between the priest-ridden countries of Italy, Austria, Spain, and Portugal, with the ignorance of the people that are under the sway of Romanism, should speak loudly to the whole of England against the attempt being made to force the Education Bill upon the country. Parochial schools under the control of Romanizing ecclesiastics could not approach unto, much less represent, the need of England, if her sons and daughters are to hold their own against the magnificent public school system of the United States and Germany. If any friends would like copies of the letter, it may be obtained at the Office of The Christian, 1½d. per copy post free, or twelve for 1s. post free.

Marylebone Dinner Table and Soup Kitchen.—This annual charity is this year being dispensed at St. Paul's Mission House, East Street, among children, adults, and invalids. During last winter, 17,785 persons received benefit, and the poor again showed their appreciation of the work by contributing largely towards the sale of tickets for cash. Soup, meat dinners, rice milk, and beef tea are provided each day in the week (Thursdays excepted), and the managers are hopeful of retaining the practical interest which the charity has always commanded. Lady Thompson, 35, Wimpole Street, W., is treasurer and secretary.

Abiding in Christ.*

By Rev. Dr. R. A. TORREY.

"If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (John xv. 7).

THE whole secret of prayer is found in these words of our Lord. Here is prayer that has unbounded power: "Ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." There is a way then of asking, and getting precisely what we ask. Christ gives two conditions of this all-prevailing prayer. The first condition is: "If ye abide in Me." What is it to abide in Christ?

He had been comparing Himself to a vine, His disciples to branches in the vine. Some branches continued in the vine, that is, remained in living union with the vine, so that the sap or life of the vine constantly flowed into them. They had no independent life of their own. Everything in them was simply the outcome of the life of the vine flowing into them. Their buds, their leaves, their blossoms, their fruit, were really not theirs, but the buds, leaves, blossoms, and fruit of the vine. Other branches were completely severed from the vine, or else the flow of sap or life of the vine into them was in some way hindered.

To abide in Christ is to renounce any independent life of our own, to give up trying to think our thoughts, form our resolutions, or cultivate our feelings, and look simply and constantly to Christ, to think His thoughts in us, form His purposes in us, to feel His emotions and affections in us. It is to renounce all life independent of Christ, and look to Him for the inflow of His life unto us, and the outworking of His life through us. When we do this, and in so far as we do this, our prayers will obtain that which we seek from God.

This must necessarily be so, for our desires will not be our own desires, but Christ's, and our prayers will not in reality be our own prayers, but Christ praying in us. Such prayers will always be in harmony with God's will. When our prayers fail, it is because they are indeed our prayers. We have conceived the desire and framed the petition of ourselves, instead of looking to Christ to pray through us.

THE SECRET OF CONTINUANCE.

To abide in Christ one must of course already be in Christ through the acceptance of Him as an atoning Saviour from the guilt of sin, a risen Saviour from the power of sin, and a Lord and Master over all his life. Being in Christ, all that we have to do to abide (or continue) in Christ, i.e., simply to renounce our self-life—utterly renouncing every thought, purpose, desire, and affection of our own, and just looking day by day, and hour by hour, for Jesus Christ to form His thoughts, purposes, desires, and affections in us.

But there is another condition stated in this verse, though it is really involved in the first: "And My words abide in you." If we are to obtain from God all that we ask from Him Christ's words must abide or continue in us. We must study His words, let them sink into our heart, keep them in our memory, obey them constantly, and let them shape our daily life.

There are many who wonder why they are so powerless in prayer, but the very simple explanation of it all is found in their neglect of the words of Christ. They have not His words in their heart. It is not by seasons of mystical meditation and rapturous experiences that we learn to abide in Christ; it is by feeding upon His written Word, and looking to the Holy Spirit to implant those words in our hearts. If we thus let the words of Christ abide in us, they will stir us up to prayer. They will be the mould in which our prayers are shaped, and our prayers will be necessarily along the lines of God's will, and will prevail with Him.

Mere intellectual study of the Word of God is not enough; there must be meditation upon it. The Word of God must be revolved over and over in the mind, with a constant looking to God to make that Word a living thing in the heart. The prayer that is born of meditation upon the Word of God is the prayer that soars upwards most easily to God's listening ear.

ROME and EDUCATION.

An admirable and timely proof of what the people of the United States thought and felt concerning the tyranny and despotism of Romanism, this cartoon was issued in 1884, when the Roman Catholics, at the instance of the Pope, fought with all their might to secure the control of the National School system of the great Republic. This persistent attempt was defeated in magnificent style, and the Popish party routed. America's estimate of what Rome's influence would be, should she gain possession of the Public School system, is vividly portrayed. Liberty trodden underfoot, and the children a helpless prey to Roman Catholic tyranny (shown by the ferocious brute that dominates the whole situation) is displayed with fidelity and truth in the cartoon; and such tragic experiences will be extended wherever Rome has the power (See Article on page 15).

A Protestant Champion.

Rev. Dr. CHARLES H. H. WRIGHT.

AMONG champions of Protestantism in this country few names are at present held in as high honour as that of Rev. Dr. Charles H. H. Wright. Born in Dublin sixty-six years ago, he showed from early years promise of that scholarship which has made him a formidable opponent in discussion and at the same time a valiant defender of the truth. As a student of Trinity College, he was first-class prizeman in Hebrew, 1854-56, as well as Arabic prizeman, 1859, and passed his divinity course with a first-class in 1858. After graduating B.A. in 1857 and M.A. in 1859, this distinguished student became a member also of the University of Oxford, and took the M.A. degree at Exeter College in 1862. Among later honours in his native city were the B.D. degree in 1873, followed by the doctorship of divinity in 1879, and the Donnellan lectureship in 1880.

At Oxford, Dr. Wright pursued a distinguished career, and has had many honours and appointments conferred upon him by the various governing bodies. His Bampton Lectures of 1878, on "Zechariah and his Prophecies," have deservedly attracted much attention. He was Grinfield Lecturer on the Septuagint, 1893-97, Public Examiner in Semitic languages, 1894-95. Other scholastic work has included the Examinership in Hebrew and New Testament Greek at London University, and the External Examinership in Hebrew at Victoria University, also at the University of Wales.

It was during a curacy of four years at Middleton-Dyas, in Yorkshire, under Dr. J. S. Blackwood, that Dr. Wright came into contact with Miss Almroth, who was destined to be his wife. Her father had been director of the Royal Mint at Stockholm, and also Professor of Chemistry at the Royal Military School at Marieberg. A meeting with Dr. and Lady Alicia Blackwood in Switzerland had led to a close friendship with the Misses Almroth who worked with Dr. Blackwood at Scutari during the Crimean War. Dr. Blackwood and Dr. Wright's father had been fellow barristers-at-law in Dublin, as well as students together at Trinity College, and it was a happy arrangement for both when the former was able to receive the son of his old friend as curate.

The young husband and wife hoped to go out to India to work in connection with the Church Missionary Society, but circumstances intervened to prevent this. Early in 1863 Dr. Wright was appointed to the British chaplaincy at Dresden, and they remained in that city five years, establishing, among other evangelical agencies, a weekly prayer-meeting attended by believers of many nationalities, to whom it was a highly valued rendezvous. Six years were thereafter spent at Boulogne, under an appointment from the Colonial and Continental Church Society, where one of Dr. Wright's first efforts, in concert with others, brought into existence the British Sailors' Institute, and led to the establishment of a highly successful mission effort.

This period of residence in France covered the years of the war with Germany, and consequently many inconveniences and interruptions were experienced. Much encouragement was met with among the seamen and other English visitors and residents. Dr. Wright's Protestant proclivities led him to take a special interest in working-class English girls, who, it was found, in many cases adopted the Roman Catholic religion on marrying Frenchmen. Roman Catholic priests and perverts from the Church of England, who frequented the town, were always on the look-out to win over Protestants, one lady making it her special business to offer Romanist tracts and pamphlets to every visitor. In some of the boarding-houses the work of perversion was systematically carried on, small oratories being set up, and the daily prayers repeated, in order to accustom English boarders to Roman Catholic practices. Dr. and Mrs. Wright found much reason to deplore the way in which the children of English Protestant families are sent to convent schools, without thought of the outcome of association with Romanists, and of friendships formed with nuns.

An exchange with the vicar of St. Mary's, Belfast, in 1874, brought Dr. Wright into personal touch with the revival associated with the names of Messrs. D. L. Moody and Ira D. Sankey. The hymn-singing in the streets was a new experience, and with the other outward signs of spiritual awakening was specially welcome to those who had been so long resident on the Continent. This charge was followed by the incumbency of Bethesda, Dublin, for six years; and that of St. John's, Liverpool, for seven years more.

The acceptance by Dr. Wright, in 1898, of the position of Clerical Superintendent of the Protestant Reformation Society, brought him, to some extent, more directly before the public in a capacity for which he was well qualified, alike by the bent of his mind, his early training, his special line of study, and the experience of later years. He is an uncompromising opponent of Roman Catholicism, and of everything that savours of priestcraft or ritualism. Over the length and breadth of the land his voice has become familiar, sounding the alarm on account of the dangers that beset the nation, and instructing those who are willing to learn about the nature and extent of the evil. One of the most useful avenues of service that have opened up before him is among the students at theological and other colleges, to whom lectures are freely given and suitable literature distributed. In 1901, Dr. Wright delivered no fewer than 188 sermons, lectures, and addresses on the history, doctrines, and principles of the Protestant faith.

Speaking at the anniversary of the Society last May, the venerable Canon Christopher said one of its greatest achievements had been to bring to the front Dr. Wright, whom he had often heard lecture. He was always happy at such times, because he knew that Dr. Wright never abused Roman Catholics, nor made use of any vituperation. In the prosecution of this propaganda wisely and persistently throughout the provinces, he is ably assisted by the secretary, Mr. Walter A. Limbrick, and the staff of missionaries recently increased in number from ten to twelve.

At present Dr. Wright is engaged, in company with Rev. Charles Neil, in the preparation for the press of a Protestant dictionary, for publication in about twelve months. After examining a preliminary part, and informing ourselves on the complete arrangements, we believe the book will be of the highest value to all who are engaged in the battle against Romish error. In order to limit it to one volume, and to permit of its being published at a popular price, care has been exercised in keeping the articles to concise form, but they are comprehensive and abreast of modern scholarship, and are written in a popular and lucid style. Every effort has been made to state arguments on the other side fairly, and to furnish replies that are sound and substantial. It is hoped that the volume will help to remove much ignorance and uncertainity in the minds of Protestants, to arrest the present tendency to indefinite opinion, and to strengthen the hands of Evangelical lecturers and preachers. The published price has been fixed at 15s., but for a limited time subscriptions will be received at 10s. 6d.

Dr. Wright is also engaged in a critical and grammatical book on Daniel. Yet another step in advance has been the preparation, in association with Mr. J. T. Tomlinson, of the Statutory Prayer Book, just issued. With many other Evangelical churchmen, they had felt strongly the injustice done to the country by the fact that no copy was available of the Book of Common Prayer printed exactly as directed in the Acts of Parliament. The justification usually put forward for the present state of affairs is that the changes are minute and unimportant, while they do much to bring the book into harmony with modern ideas. But, as Dr. Wright contends, even the omission of a comma may become a matter of importance when the ambiguity thus produced is taken advantage of as the only support for definite teaching.

There has been no pedantic adherence to the original "Annexed Book" of the Act of 1662. "Many minute variations are purposely passed over, as they are exceedingly numerous as well as trivial, and many would appear to be mere survivals of archaic spelling, or of a punctuation, systematic, no doubt, but belonging to a system which has ceased to be familiar. . . . Our object has been, not a mere slavish reproduction, but to rectify certain unwarranted departures from the authorized text, which have been relied upon for inculcating doctrines and practices foreign to the spirit of the Church of England." Referring to the suppression of the comma after the word "grace," in the definition of "this word Sacrament" in the Catechism, the preface points out that, "as now illegally printed, the definition implies that grace is always 'given' in every 'Sacrament,' even to a Simon Magus, or any other unbelieving hypocrite or perjured person! Whereas, as the contemporary Latin version of Dean Durel witnesses, it is the 'sign,' and not the grace (signum gratiæ quod datur), which is invariably 'given' in the due administration of every Sacrament."

With regard to the Education Bill, Dr. Wright has assured us that his attitude is not merely that of "criticism," but of direct "opposition." Whatever may be the professions of High Church ecclesiastics, he has no doubt that the result of the passing of the Bill will be the placing of a very large number of schools, for the first time, under the direct influence and control of Ritualistic clergymen, who will use the opportunity afforded them for purposes which cannot be approved by true Protestants.

As a native of the Sister Isle, Dr. Wright takes a special interest in the University question in Ireland. He views with deep concern the trend of Government policy in the matter. The following words on the subject are well worthy of being carefully pondered:—"The tendency of modern politics has been to cut off Roman Catholics from all possible intercourse with their Protestant countrymen. In the village and city schools, the children of the different creeds have long since been separated from one another. Roman Catholic infants are systematically taught to avoid all intercourse with Protestants. In the higher schools the same plan is now being almost universally carried out. And now the effort is being made to cut off Roman Catholics from all intercourse with Protestants in the highest places of education. The mental food of the Roman Catholics is to be carefully doled out to them. They are to be placed from their birth up to full manhood under the Roman priesthood. Roman Catholics are by Papal authority now permitted, indeed, to attend the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; and halls of residence, with the Papal approval, have been prepared for their use in those Universities. But a similar liberty is to be denied to Roman Catholics in Ireland. How can it be expected that men, who have been trained up to manhood to look upon one another with feelings of hatred and suspicion, will, as citizens of the Empire, unlearn the principles which have been carefully instilled into them by the priesthood? The trend of present-day legislation, by its wholesale endowment of Romanism, and its patronage of sacerdotalism, has not been in the direction of National love or National unity."

Dr. Wright's pen is never idle, and many busy workers are his debtors for help received from his numerous books and pamphlets. "The Bible Readers' Manual" has been a treasure to Sunday-school teachers and other students all over the land. Editions of Genesis and Ruth in Hebrew, with a critically-revised text in each case, are well known to, and highly appreciated by Old Testament scholars; while the Donnellan Lectures on Ecclesiastes have done much to clear the ground of controversy with modern critics. An interesting biographical volume is Mrs. Wright's "Sunbeams on my Path."

Owing to ill-health and increasing years, Dr. Chaplin has now retired from active service for the London Jews' Society after forty-two years' work. For twenty-five years Dr. Chaplin was in charge of the Society's Hospital in Jerusalem, and since 1885 has filled the office of inspector of the Society's missions. He has also regularly conducted the Medical Mission in Whitechapel, E., since 1891.

Anarchists in Geneva.—I.

ITALY has not sufficient support for all her working men; therefore they are driven from Italy to earn abroad the bread they cannot get at home. Such a state of things fills their hearts with revenge against people with money, kings, and governments, and makes them an easy prey to the Anarchist leaders who have made of Geneva their headquarters. There are in Geneva from 12,000 to 13,000 Italians, who are generally employed as navvies and masons, and live in the darkest and poorest houses. They are, as a rule, not the best specimens of Italians. Most of them live in boarding-houses—a few rooms with a kitchen, where they all eat, talk, smoke, drink, play, and blaspheme.

"Good evening," I say, opening the door of one of these boarding-houses about 8 o'clock in the evening. "You are all Italians, I believe, so I invite you to come to our Italian Hall"; and entering the room, full of tobacco smoke and noise of bottles and glasses, I ask them if they will accept one of my little monthly papers, "L'Italiano."

"Yes, thank you," says one of them, holding in his hand a Socialist paper full of caricatures. "Yes, this paper has nothing but fine things about the priests!" "Yes, Italy," I answer, "has need of the religion of the Gospel, and with the Gospel all goes better." I was going to continue in the same strain, when a workman, in a louder voice than the others, began to shout, saying all religions have been invented to fatten the priests.

"Let us leave alone the religions of men; let us look at the religion of Christ."

"Ah!" replied the same workman, with a look full of revolt and insult, "Christ was only a man like me." Thus he went on hurling insults and reproofs against religion and all authorities.

"But do you not feel that you are a poor sinner; if to-night you had to appear before God, would you not feel much embarrassed?"

"God . . . God . . .?" said my Anarchist interlocutor, "do I not say that he does not exist?" Meanwhile he got up, and going to the table where his companions were playing and drinking, took the cards in his hands, and sitting down began to play. And as I continued to talk on sin and God, he exclaimed, "I cannot go on talking with you any longer, because I am busy playing!" He said nothing more, and began to play with desperation.

This is the atmosphere in which the poor Italian workman lives: darkness of sin and atheism, and anarchism—centres of corruption.

I have lately spent several hours in what I call the Anarchist den, a room with photographs of criminals on the walls, registers, and anarchist correspondence on the table, and several thousand tracts for the propaganda on bookshelves.

"Why in your writings and discourses are you so bitter against religion?" I asked of one Anarchist.

"The reason we are opposed to the Christian religion is because it does not favour rebellion; it fact, it condemns it."

"You are right; Christ is love; rebellion makes enemies of men; in love alone is the secret of true happiness."

"It is not charity that we want, but the abolition of private capital; we want all things in common."

I then bade my Anarchist good-bye, but before leaving him, "Read this tract," I said, giving him a little book, "The Conversion of an Anarchist; Saved by Prayer."

Buenos Ayres.—Mr. Robert L. Hodge, Victoria Gospel Press, writes:—"Myself and comrades have safely arrived in Buenos Ayres, all well. Admirably suitable premises have been taken, and all is now in readiness to receive the press and printing plant when it shall have passed through the Customs. The printing and dissemination of Gospel literature will then be proceeded with without delay. Our address is Montes de Oca 2033 Buenos Ayres."

The Fans of West Africa.

WE have from time to time called attention to the progress of the Gospel among the great Fan tribe in West Africa, particularly with reference to the labours of the late Rev. Arthur W. Marling. In June, last year, we told the story how the work of the departed missionary was taken up by his sorrowing widow, who has not only given the people of the country a volume of Gospel hymns, but, at great cost of energy and time, devoted a furlough and private means to place in their hands the story of God's work in providence and grace.

In the circumstances, it was not possible to give the people a translation of the Bible. Mr. Marling having been called home, there was no one to undertake such a responsible work. Without delay, however, Mrs. Marling has done the next thing—she has passed through the press a translation into the Fan dialect of the well-known "Story of the Bible," by Charles Foster, of Philadelphia. Written for the young, this work is eminently suited for the Fans, who are but children in intelligence and education. At Mr. Marling's death the work of translation had reached an advanced stage; it has since been completed, and in a few weeks copies will be ready for shipment.

As is well known, "The Story of the Bible" outlines in simple fashion the history of the earth and of God's dealings with the race. For five years the Fans have been eagerly waiting for it. Its pages will take light and joy "o'er the gloomy hills of darkness"; and many will thank God for the help rendered in its production by friends, particularly by readers of The Christian.

The book is fully illustrated. By such means the strange things related can be vividly brought home to the hearts and minds of the Fan people. The engravings have entailed extra expense; but in her exertions Mrs. Marling has been encouraged in unexpected ways. About £70 is still due to the printer and engraver, and there is every hope that this will soon be cleared off. Letters to Mrs. Marling may be addressed to our care.

Among Japanese Sailors.

ALTHOUGH the Coronation Fleet has returned, Miss McLean is as busy as ever. As a rule, two ships a month arrive in London, with about a hundred men in each. These have generally heard in their own land of the kindness of the missionary lady. They know her as "the Mother of the Japanese Sailors," and they are as keen on finding her out at Tilbury Dock as she is on seeking them in the name of Christ.

During the entire summer Miss McLean was very fully occupied at Plymouth, Portsmouth, and Sheerness, as well as in London. She distributed 1,200 Japanese New Testaments, also Gospel tracts, and picture cards, made up in attractive bags, with pin-cushions and such-like useful articles. She received from time to time many warm-hearted letters from the captains and officers of the ships; and quite enthusiastic accounts of her kind exertions were sent to the Japanese newspapers.

Miss McLean exercises a remarkable influence over our Japanese visitors. She helps them to see London, directs them to advantage in their business rounds, and in a score of ways secures their comfort and safety while far from home. And of course she sees that they carry back the story of Christ in some form or other. She is glad to receive supplies of books, bags, scarves, woollen helmets, &c. Her address is—Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex.

Facts Concerning the Convent Pestilence is a substantial pamphlet, giving particulars of some of the more recent operations of the Convent Inquiry Society. (6d. net. Office of the Society: 8, Gray's Inn Place, W.C.; S. J. Abbott, Secretary.) The pages outline work that must have been attended by much anxiety on the part of the agents of the Society; and afford many sidelights of the unscrupulous methods of Roman Catholic propagandists.

Incidents of Prison Visiting.*

By MR. CHARLES COOK.

"IT's dogged as does it," as one of old has said; and certainly there are signs of improvement in penological matters in many lands.

It was said less than a decade ago, "There is nothing whatever in our English prison system calculated to reform men, much less convert them."

For a quarter of a century and more I have been speaking and writing of the needs of a better system or treatment of prisoners in the world at large, and seeking to plead the cause of those unable to speak for themselves.

"When did you last have a visit?" I asked one of the four American forgers, who had been sentenced "for life."

"This is the first visit I have had for sixteen years," was his answer. His friends were all in America, and he was serving his time at Portsmouth when I thus addressed him. "That is the first shake of the hands I have had for fourteen years," said a convict once to the unexpected brotherly hand stretched out; and as he spoke tears poured down his cheeks.

A convict might serve a "life sentence" and never have such a privilege, for no ordinary visitor, though it were his wife, may ever touch him—but Christian energy sometimes manages to break through red tape officialism.

Riding outside a 'bus one evening last winter, was a friend who suddenly looked up at the heavens and said, "This is the first time I've seen the stars for eleven years." He was C——, and had just "done" fifteen years' penal servitude; but while in "durance vile" had been converted to God through the Governor of Parkhurst Prison, Lieut.-Col. Plummer, and commended to my care. England has tried this system; and that we hope she is now willing to try the "Christian system."

"THE KING OF THE FORGERS,"

Great good has resulted from the holding of "missions" in the convict prisons, and what is wanted now is liberty for accredited qualified Christian outside visitors to be permitted to visit our gaols.

Some improvement has also taken place in the classification of prisoners between the age of sixteen and twenty-one. Formerly a mere lad has had to associate with habitual criminals, with the result that he has left prison hardened in sin and crime.

Sir Robert Anderson says, "There is need of a radical change in the treatment of persons guilty of grave and habitual crime." Of the total convict population of 2,879, no less than 1,342 had been previously sentenced to penal servitude, or three or four sentences of imprisonment for serious crime.

One great need in England is that of who would preach the simple, glorious Gospel.

Alas! what prisoners sometimes get in its place is the following, and it is on the authority of a Christian chief warder. A prisoner who had been convicted more than once went "to see the chaplain," who addressed him thus: "Well, old thief, what do you want?"

Said the man to my friend, "I went back to my cell more hardened than ever, and cursing the chaplain."

On another occasion a dog thief went to see the same gentleman, and was met with a sarcastic "Bow, woh, woh, woh, woh."

"If he has a dawg when I goes out I'll 'ave him," was the remark made to the chief warder by the prisoner. This is hardly what we pay our chaplains five or six hundred a year to do.

Let me bear witness to the fact that prisoners are amenable to kindness, and when the heart is opened the Gospel is likely to enter.

It was my privilege in Edinburgh to hold special services in the Calton Gaol by the invitation of the late Captain Christie, and for a short time also to act as chaplain.

Every morning there was a Gospel address given, followed on the Sunday by a prayer meeting, at which many rose and asked to be prayed for; but during the afternoon I was permitted to visit all those prisoners who were desirous of seeing me, and I sincerely believe many of those who knelt in their cells passed from death unto life, whilst penitential tears told of the sincerity of these sad converts.

Around the Sea of Galilee.

IT will be remembered that in 1884 Dr. Torrance was appointed by the Free Church of Scotland to work as medical missionary among Jews and others around the Sea of Galilee. An important extension of the mission took place in 1895, when the hospital was built. It has accommodation for twenty-four bed and six cots. Each bed is named after its supporter. Attached to the hospital there is an outdoor or dispensary department, where, on an average, between forty and fifty patients are attended daily; but sometimes as many as 100 seek advice in one day. A Gospel address is given and prayer offered each morning for the benefit of waiting patients. Dr. Torrance speaks of the desirability of a Christian worker who could follow up this work by private talk, and visit patients in their homes.

The heat in Tiberias during summer is so great that the hospital is closed. Missionaries work at Safed during this time, where there is a branch station with boys' and girls' schools and a medical mission. In summer there is a very large dispensary practice, the population being more than four times as large as Tiberias.

A recent report from Dr. Torrance says that from far and near patients are brought to the hospital, some on the backs of donkeys, horses, or camels, and even on the backs of friends, and great is the disappointment if they are unable to obtain accommodation. The work is conducted on the same lines as in former years. No distinction of creed is made and no ceremonial difficulty is put in the way of any while in hospital. Jewish (Kosher) as well as Gentile food is provided, and all realize that it is a Christian institution established to help them, and very seldom is any objection taken to the daily service in the hospital. During the year, 398 in-patients were treated. Many of them required residence of months in the hospital.

Occasionally, in summer, Dr. Torrance visits the encampments round the Lake, or goes up to the highlands on the other side. Here he sets up a hospital tent, and treats those who "dwell in tents."

The hospital is supported by voluntary contributions, and gifts of blankets, quilts, children's clothing, &c., are always welcome. Communications may be addressed to Dr. W. F. Somerville, Tyrefield, Wilson Street, Hillhead, Glasgow.

Cholera at Jaffa.—Miss Newton, who for the past twenty-two years has been engaged in hospital and mission work in Jaffa, reports the outbreak of cholera in the town, and at Lydd, thirteen miles distant. Miss Watson writes from the latter place: "Death is making sad work at Lydd, and what can we do? The native pastor has died after twenty-four hours' illness. Tamana, the teacher, is stricken, and twenty-six deaths yesterday, and many cases to-day. Thank God we are well at present. This is a very solemn time. Our servants are such a comfort, and so are the Scripture-reader and his wife. Our medicines are running out. We go on from 5 a.m. till 10 p.m. I think it cruel of the Government to do nothing." Miss Newton adds: "Distress is very great in Jaffa, and in all the towns and villages round; every day the prices of flour and firing are rising, so that the outlook is a very gloomy one. If in Egypt, under much more favourable sanitary conditions and with English control, the deaths amounted to 30,000, it is to be feared under Turkish mismanagement the mortality in Palestine may be still higher. Help towards relief may be sent to Mr. Charles Edmund Newton, The Manor, Mickleover, Derby.

Natal.—REV. G. E. WEEKS, St. Paul's Vicarage, Durban, Natal, will be glad to receive from friends gifts of marked Testaments and Christian booklets, as adjuncts to aggressive evangelistic work among the hundreds of young men who are settling down in South Africa.

American Notes.

For the first time in several years the American Board of Foreign Missions has been able to close its fiscal year free from debt, and with a balance in hand. During the year a debt of 102,341dols. has been extinguished, and 1,431dols. were left in hand. The total receipts for the year were over 845,000 dols. The ninety-third annual convention takes place next month, and will be held at Oberlin, Ohio. One of the most interesting features of the assembly will be the laying of the corner-stone of the Martyr's Memorial, to be erected in honour of the missionaries sent out by the Board who were murdered during the Boxer outbreak in China. Nearly all the thirteen missionaries who perished had graduated from the Oberlin College, and the Memorial, which will be erected on the campus, will be in the form of an arch. It will be built of buff Indiana limestone, and will cost 30,000dols.

A curious crisis has arisen before the Methodists of the United States, and the bishops and other prominent officials are making very strenuous efforts to meet it. The missionary operations of this church in China, Japan, India, Korea, the Philippines, Mexico, South America and Porto Rico, have expanded so rapidly and so suddenly that the annual income of a million and a quarter of dollars is not sufficient for the expenditure now involved. For a year, now, a campaign has been pushed to raise the revenue to a million and a half, and it is possible that before long it may be necessary to ask for two millions. To add impetus to the movement, a huge convention is being held at Cleveland, Ohio, from October 21-24. Arrangements have been made to accommodate 2,500 delegates, representing every department of Methodist activity. Bishop Hartzell, from Africa, will deliver addresses at the Convention, and then in churches, and Bishop Moore is on his way from China to assist in the enterprise. ROGER MARTIN.

New York.

From Distressful Armenia.

WE recently inserted a brief paragraph in reference to a young Armenian Christian who had escaped from Harpoot during the massacre which decimated the inhabitants in 1895. Having reached this country he obtained tuition in medicine and surgery at the London Hospital, and returned to the Armenian province of the Persian Empire in May last, permission to return to Turkey having been refused him. Mr. Wm. Chorley (6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.), who is acting as correspondent for Mr. Artinian Hagopian, explains that with the £10 given by our readers in July for the work he was able to despatch two cases of much-needed medical supplies.

In a letter of acknowledgement, Mr. Hagopian writes:—"My pen is unable to describe a tenth part of the need of this district. Lately I have been allowed to preach the Gospel from the altar of the Armenian church. This is quite a new thing among my people. Please send me some interesting Gospel and Temperance stories that I may translate them for my people. As soon as the Lord sends me help I shall hire a house, first of all, or a large room, and gather in the children to teach them the way of the Lord. During the colder winter weather expenses will be heavier. In the summer, like the sparrows, I could live and sleep anywhere with my two little blankets, but now it is getting colder it gets harder. So, excuse me, if I ask you to remember my needs in the Lord for this coming winter."

Madagascar.—In an interesting report of an interview with Rev. J. Pearse, who for nearly half a century has been a missionary in Madagascar, the Daily News has furnished a very cheering account of the progress made by the Gospel in the population of about five millions scattered throughout that large island, which, by the way, is of greater extent than France. Mr. Pearse pays a just tribute to the improved administration by the French, and testifies to the absolute freedom under which the Protestant missions are not only tolerated, but encouraged. He says: "There is less to overcome than in some countries. They have no great system of idolatry, and rites, and temples. There is mainly superstition, and charms, and witchcraft. During the time I have been there the Mission has passed from a state of infancy to one of healthy manhood. Adherents are numerous, and the churches are numbered by hundreds. When I began scarcely any could read or write. Now, when you go into the large congregations, you hear the rustle of the leaves as they turn them over in reading their Bibles in Malagasy." It is the same old, old story of the elevating and sanctifying power of the simple Gospel of Christ.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

GREENOCK.

THE campaign meetings at Greenock have left not only a gracious memory, but an abiding influence. It is evident, from the comments of the Press and the vivid letters of temperance leaders, that the whole district has been deeply stirred. In addition to the impassioned addresses of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, and the Gospel singing of Mr. Armon Jones, the telling lectures of Mr. Tennyson Smith had an arousing effect. Dr. Henry and Mr. Smith are able to report that over 5,500 pledges were secured.

CORK.

Under the auspices of the Irish Temperance League a United Gospel Temperance Campaign in Ireland, to extend a little over a month, has been entered upon by Dr. Henry, accompanied by Mr. T. Armon Jones, soloist. The places to be visited include Cork, Limerick, Waterford, Wexford, Belfast, and Dublin. The first two meetings of the series were held on Lord's Day week in the Assembly Rooms, Cork, the afternoon meeting being under the presidency of Mr. J. C. Newsom, J.P. (who extended to the missioners a very hearty welcome to the city), supported by many of the principal residents. In the evening the chairman was Mr. Alexander McOstrich, J.P. Large audiences assembled, and Dr. Henry spoke with his accustomed forcefulness on "The Church or the Public-house, which?" and on "Partnership with the Publican;" and, while riveting the attention of his hearers by his zealous advocacy, urged them to assume the responsibility of the overthrow of this great curse, for the honour of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and for the good of the world.

At the Monday evening meeting there was again a large and interested audience. Dr. Henry spoke with power. His address covered the relations of the drink traffic to industrial problems. In an effective peroration he said that in American firms established in England no man is employed who gambles or drinks. "What percentage of working men in Cork," the speaker asked, "would obtain a situation if those conditions were laid down?" Those who take the temperance pledge, he contended, find their health better, their brains clearer, and their pockets heavier. The lecture was full of brilliant pleading. The Bishop of Cork, who presided, in expressing the appreciation of the audience, said that they would all be the better for the very noble address they had heard, more determined in their professions and in their active work for the blessed Temperance cause.

On the following evening, Rev. Dr. Murphy presided. Dr. Henry spoke on "The Physical Aspect," and adduced a vast amount of evidence dealing with the evils to the human body caused by alcoholic indulgence. One striking passage dealt with temperance in the army and navy. Lord Wolseley said that drink is England's most pressing enemy. Lord Roberts said of India that out of the 75,000 troops under his command 25,000 were total abstainers, and the 25,000 abstainers were able to do the work of 2,000 additional troops. The death rate there was 31 per 1,000 among non-abstainers, moderate drinkers 23 per 1,000, and abstainers only 11 per 1,000. Dr. Henry earnestly appealed to the people to abstain, and so help others to do the same.

Rev. Canon Daunt presided at the concluding meeting on the Wednesday night. In introducing Dr. Henry, the chairman said that the Temperance question is the leading one of the day. Every effort to further the cause should be made by both Church and State.

Dr. Henry then gave his popular and intensely interesting lecture on "Publichouse Life in America." Among the important facts set forth were these—(1) That over ten thousand communities of the United States have within the last ten years voted against the manufacture and sale of drink in their midst; (2) That there are to-day 30,000,000 people who live in such communities where the manufacture and sale are barred by law.

Dr. Henry aroused much sympathy by his declaration that "it is a disgrace to the sex for women to serve behind publichouse bars," and he called forth the enthusiasm of temperance hearers in his appeal to the people to sign the pledge, and so hasten the time when the publichouses will be closed for ever. Mr. Armon Jones contributed much to the success of the mission by his beautiful Gospel singing. The total number of pledges secured was 195.

LIMERICK.

For a mission in connection with the Limerick Total Abstinence Society, Dr. Henry was heartily welcomed back to the town on November 6, and the right hand of fellowship was extended to Mr. Armon Jones on the occasion of his first visit.

The mission was for three days, two meetings being held each day. On each occasion Dr. Henry spoke powerfully on important subjects connected with the Temperance question.

On Sabbath morning Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones took the service in the Baptist Chapel. Dr. Henry's sermon on "Passion for Christ" was powerful and soul-stirring. The large congregation was impressed with solemn determination to lead better, nobler, more useful, and enthusiastic lives for the Master. In the afternoon the subject was on "Does the Bible Teach Total Abstinence?" and at the final meeting in the evening, which was a record one, Dr. Henry dealt with "Drink, the Judas Iscariot of the Modern World."

The power of God was manifest during the mission, and another such time of blessing is hoped for at no late date.

The late Rev. Alex. Matheson.

By the death of Rev. A. Matheson, M.A., of Belgrave Church, S.W., the Presbyterian body has lost one of its most loyal and devoted ministers. He was born in 1860. After serving for a time as missionary at Benwell in connection with Westmoreland Road congregation, Newcastle, he accepted a call, almost immediately after being licensed, to Jarrow-on-Tyne. Here he entered with high hopefulness on a very faithful ministry. During the six years of his pastorate, commodious and complete school premises were erected, while there gathered round him a large and deeply attached congregation. Next came a removal to Blair Atholl, in which widely-scattered charge six more laborious years were spent. But his heart was set upon the great cities, and it was with an eager delight that he came to Belgrave, where for nearly four years he laboured with increasing success, gladly putting forth all his strength to meet the growing claims of a very happy ministry. With his robust constitution he did not fear the strain. But it was greater than he realised, and all unexpectedly the end came when he was full of generous plans for his congregation's and his Church's good.

Record of Christian Work.—The November issue of the Record of Christian Work contains, besides others from American writers, valuable contributions by Rev. J. H. Jowett, on "Filling up the Sufferings"; by Dr. Joseph Parker, on "A Generation in a London Pulpit"; and by Rev. John Kelman, on "The One Hundredth Psalm." News of doings at Northfield, as well as in the mission field, go to make up a very interesting Christian magazine. Under the special charge of Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, "Bible Notes of Daily Devotions" is a feature which brings before the reader a wide range of devotional literature, in addition to Mr. Morgan's own helpful and suggestive thoughts on each topic. (6s. per annum post-free. Morgan & Scott.)

Irish Notes.

THE fifteenth annual Methodist Junior Ministers' Convention was held last week in Lisburn. No one who has been over seven years in the ministry can be a member, and the attendance was a record one, about sixty members being present from various parts of Ireland. Rev. F. E. Harte, of Sligo, presided, and delivered the Convention sermon; while papers on "The Ministry of to-day," "The Atonement," "A Passion for Souls," and kindred subjects were read and discussed. Rev. R. M. Ker, of the Belfast Central Mission, was elected president for the coming year; and it was decided to hold the next meeting at Roscrea, co. Tipperary.

In connection with the Children's Mission at Carrickfergus, the Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist Churches joined and held a united mission for young people in Albert Hall. A different minister presided each evening, and the hall was crowded at every meeting with a most attentive audience. The numbers that waited for the after-meetings increased from night to night, until at the last service fully 200 young people remained to be spoken to, and it is believed that many of these decided for Christ. The town has been stirred by the mission as it has not for a long time, and it is hoped that lasting work has been accomplished.

A very interesting missionary Conference has been held in the Protestant Hall, Longford, the Archdeacon of Ardagh presiding, and there was a good attendance. Addresses or papers were given on such subjects as "Work in the Mission Field," "The Marching Orders of the Church," "How to get a Personal Interest in Foreign Missions," and the "Organization of Diocesan and Parochial Work for Missions." Revs. W. O'Connor, A. J. Pike, Dr. Gidley, Mr. D. Irwin, and others, took part in the proceedings, which are sure to result in stirring up great interest in missions on the part of those who were present.

Welsh Notes.

AT a recent meeting of delegates at Wrexham, it was decided to take steps to form a temperance association for West Denbighshire. The Traelor, Llangollen, and Ceiriog valleys are included in the district to be represented by the new association. There is much need of organized temperance effort in the county, and it is to be hoped that the new organization will accomplish much useful service in the temperance cause.

At the recent quarterly meetings of the Anglesea Welsh Congregationalists, a resolution was passed which is deserving of notice by all denominations. The resolution urged the parents of boys and girls attending the intermediate schools of the county to write to the churches in the neighbourhood of such schools. Such intimation will enable the churches to look after the youthful scholars during their absence from home.

A great deal of interest has been awakened among Welsh Calvinistic Methodists by the proposal brought before the Vale of Clwyd Presbytery to urge the Connexion to formulate a creed. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists already possess a Confession of Faith and a Catechism which is a recognised standard in their midst. The new proposal is to sum up the contents of the Confession of Faith and the Catechism in a much shorter compass than is now the case.

On Thursday, November 6, Mr. Thomas Adams, secretary of the Garden City Association, delivered a lecture at the Y.M.C.A., Cardiff, on "Garden Cities of To-morrow." In the course of his remarks the lecturer declared that the slums of our large cities compared very unsatisfactorily with those on the Continent. The Garden Cities' Association had been formed to assist in relieving the congestion in crowded cities by the redistribution of the industrial population on the land.

The superintendent of the Welsh Forward Movement, Rev. Dr. Pugh, has received a most earnest appeal from a prominent Welsh resident in Capetown, drawing attention to the spiritual condition and needs of the Welsh people who have settled in South Africa. The suggestion is made that the Calvinistic Methodists of Wales should send out a number of earnest and gifted young ministers, and become responsible for their support for a few years. Further, it is suggested that these ministers should be attached and made subject to the South African Presbyterian Assembly.

"Israel's Return and Other Verses."—A copy of the second edition of this book, by Dr. Andrew Moody, containing a description of the Archduchess Maria Dorothea's well-known intervention on behalf of Dr. Keith, over sixty years ago, has been sent to His Imperial and Royal Highness the Archduke Joseph, "the good Archduchess'" son. Dr. Moody has received from Alcsuth Castle, from H.I. and R. Highness' Court Secretary, a very gracious acknowledgment.

About Books.

SOME NOVEMBER MAGAZINES.

The Girls' Own Paper opens with a new serial, "More About Pixie," by Mrs. George de Horne Vaizey; and the other features sustain the high reputation of a deservedly popular monthly.

In the Sunday at Home David Lyall begins a story, "The Intervening Sea." The "Protestant Study Circle" is an excellent feature, designed to promote a deeper intelligence on the controversy with Rome.

The high standard of the Leisure Hour is worthily maintained in the November issue, which marks the commencement of a new volume. Bright and interesting from cover to cover, the contents are a marvel of variety. There is an illustrated description of Oxford, also a striking paper on "Engine Drivers."

For circles where a wider range of reading is desired Great Thoughts will make friends for itself. Biographical sketches include Raphael and Lord Cromer. The notes on current literature given under "My Study Table" supply good advice for those whose purchases of books must be limited. To show how specialists regard their own special subjects, Henty deals with boys' books and Andrew Carnegie with "Wealth and its Uses." As usual, short items are gathered from an almost bewildering variety of sources.

The Lamp of Friendship, and other sermons, by Rev. Isaac O. Stalberg, is the twenty-fifth volume of "The Baptist Pulpit" (2s. 6d. net. A. H. Stockwell). The discourses are twelve in number, and make good and helpful reading.

Messrs. Morgan & Scott are about to issue a special cheap edition of Sacred Songs and Solos, and New Hymns and Solos, 888 pieces—compiled and sung by Ira D. Sankey—large type, words, giraffe covers, 4½d.; printed cloth, 6d. Also, Elijah: the Prophet of all Time." By Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., Rector of All Souls, Langham Place. (Art Vellum cloth, 1s.)

Rev. Arnold Frank, of Hamburg, well known as a worker among the Jews, gives us a series of deeply interesting biographical chapters in a booklet Zeugen aus Israel (Expedition des Zions Freund, 31, Eimsbüttelerstr., Hamburg). It is refreshing once more to read the story, though only in outline, of Da Costa, Capadose, Neander, Caspari, Rabinowitz, Herschell, Edersheim, Saphir, and other witnesses from the House of Israel.

All statements to the contrary notwithstanding, men and women are still found attending the ministry of the Gospel whenever they feel that they are being helped to live their daily life. We can understand that the hearers of the sermons comprising Gethsemane, by Rev. William S. Swanson (3s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), received such an impetus, and that the preacher was encouraged to go on in the same path of exposition. Such discourses make profitable devotional reading for a wider circle. In every case, without any forcing, the personal application of the truth is clear and distinct.

George Muller of Bristol, by Dr. A. T. Pierson, is the standard life of the founder of the orphan houses on Ashley Down. We welcome a new edition—the sixth—in cheaper style. (2s. 6d. Nisbet.) From beginning to end this biography is profoundly interesting; and not simply as a whole, but in its several parts, it is replete with spiritual teaching such as Christians will know how to appreciate. The story of the man who put God to the test, and proved during long years that "the faithful, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much in its working," will not soon go out of print. In all forms the volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes.

The new season's catalogue of Christmas Cards and the other artistic publications of Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, justifies the high expectations aroused by experiences of previous years. The utmost ingenuity has been exercised in pressing into service the conceits and master-pieces of art. Adults and young people of the most varied tastes will all find that they have been catered for. Among the cards cameos appear in many attractive styles. The carbon and platino panels are also worthy of close attention. Intaglio and Wedgwood wall texts abound at every price from the lowest upward. Attractive booklets include such subjects as "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing" (Charles Wesley), "His Footsteps" (Charlotte Murray), and "Blest be the Tie that Binds" (John Fawcett). Among untearable toy-books we find a "Bible A B C," "Old Bible Stories," and "In the Beginning." Sacred art is well represented among wall calendars of different sizes, as well as in the daily tear-off block variety.

An attractive reprint which calls for a warm word of welcome is No Cross No Crown, by William Penn (leather 2s. 6d. net. Isbister). In the quaint phraseology of the author, this is "a discourse showing the nature and discipline of the holy cross of Christ, and that the denial of self and daily bearing of Christ's cross is the alone way to the rest and kingdom of God." It will be well if, by the reading of such spiritual classics, the present generation can be carried back to the practice of reflection and meditation, which seem to be, to a great extent, "lost arts." We have much to learn about the will of God, and the way in which He would have us walk, from such writings as those of Penn.

A work of reference, which will answer thousands of the questions raised in literary study, is The Reader's Handbook of Allusions, References, Plots, and Stories. By the late Rev. E. Cobham Brewer, LL.D. (Revised and cheaper edition, 3s. 6d. Chatto & Windus.) A companion volume to the author's well-known "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable," this is a work of many attractions. Famous names in fiction are the subject of pen-portraits, for the most part luminous and succinct; and much that is curious regarding men and things, fancies and conceits, historical events and mythological stories is classified so as to be accessible for reference and comparative study. The book does not satisfy every inquiry—what volume does? but it is a marvellous compilation, revised and enlarged since the death of its learned and versatile compiler.

It is evident that when writing Glimpses of the Glory-Land (1s. Jarrold) Rev. Robert Middleton was dealing with a subject of which his heart was full. He has meditated much and deeply on the light shed on it in Scripture, as well as on the significant silences there. He raises such questions as where heaven is, whether we shall know each other there, how we shall be employed, and the nature of the government. All are dealt with in a reverent spirit, and the constant introduction of the Biblical language will give to the careful reader a full grasp of the actual teaching. Mr. Middleton has also brought out the richness of our popular hymnology bearing on the topic, while a number of less known German hymns and poems greatly enrich the pages.

Believers will find real help in the application to their own lives and circumstances of "the mind of the Master" in The Principles of Jesus, by Robert E. Speer (2s. 6d.). To teachers who have difficulty in explaining seeming contradictions, or in accounting for neglect to obey seemingly direct precepts, it will be a boon. Fifty-four topics, touching life at many points, are chosen, and the teaching of the Lord thereon, by word or example, carefully gathered and arranged, with continual reference to the actual passages. The materials are provided for many Bible-readings, or for the instruction of senior classes in the doing of the will of God. The matter is suggestive, rather than exhaustive, and those who make best use of the book will find it a guide into a method of study far beyond the special subjects treated. Christ and Life (2s. 6d.), by the same author, is a useful companion volume. The chapters are frank brotherly talks to men and women in the midst of the battle, by one who speaks not only from personal experience but as the long and trusted adviser of many. The reader who is beginning to fear that the battle may be too much for him, will find in these pages that which will encourage him to go forward with the assurance of victory in the end through Christ. The Y.M.C.A.

At the annual Conference of the Lancashire District Union, held at Bury, it was reported that there are now in the division fifty-six Associations. Forty-three new branches have been formed or are in the course of formation. These have a membership of 3,447; the total membership of the division is 10,003.

At a meeting held at Burnley on October 28, with the object of forming a Young Men's Christian Association for that town, 100 names of intending members were handed in, upwards of sixty being those of volunteers who signed the pledge, and were otherwise helped by the Y.M.C.A. workers amongst the volunteers recently encamped on Perham Down.

Mr. Philip Hurditch has been giving a series of helpful and earnest talks to young men at the Tottenham and Edmonton Y.M.C.A. The addresses have been well received and appreciated by the members and friends. The syllabus of the winter's work of this Association is an evidence of the deep concern on the part of the officers and committee for the welfare of the young men of the district, and will afford many opportunities for advancement, both spiritual and educational.

Earl Roberts has written expressing his "keen appreciation of the splendid efforts" made by the Y.M.C.A. in the Volunteer encampments during the past summer, and his hearty congratulations on the results achieved. Lord Wolseley writes: "I sincerely hope that the success of the efforts made this year may encourage the Associations to repeat in future years the good work they have done in 1902. I have long known the good work the Y.M.C.A. does amongst all our soldiers, and I know how much that work is appreciated by them." General Sir Evelyn Wood and Major General Sir H. M. Leslie Rundle have also expressed themselves as warmly appreciative of and interested in the work.

The foundation stones of the large new building which is to be erected in Dale End for the Birmingham Y.M.C.A. were laid on the 4th inst. The Lord Mayor, Alderman J. H. Lloyd, took part in the ceremony, together with Sir James Sawyer, Mr. George Cadbury, Mr. Ebenezer Parkes, M.P., Lord Kinnaird, Rev. J. H. Jowett, Rev. Canon Sutton, Mr. Henry Whitwell (secretary, who has rendered devoted service to the work over a period of twenty-two years), and other friends. The site for the building, which has cost £6,500, is generously presented by Mr. George Cadbury. The scheme entails an expenditure of nearly £30,000, of which £22,000 is already in prospect.

Some two years ago the Foreign Department of Y.M.C.A.'s initiated steps for sending out young men of decided Christian character to fill appointments in business establishments in Eastern cities, the understanding being that such would devote their spare time on week evenings and Lord's days to helping the work of the Associations and of the missionaries. Provision was, at the time, made in the constitution of the department for effecting this object, and since then several young men have, indirectly through its agency, been helped to find openings. The experience gained has been so satisfactory that a few months ago a branch was established with Mr. R. Laidlaw, of Messrs. Whiteaway, Laidlaw, and Co., as chairman, to further develop this agency under the direction of a joint committee representing the National Council and the Houses of Business Bible Class Union.

The French National Alliance of Y.M.C.A.'s have just celebrated the jubilee of the formation of their first Association—that in Paris. In conjunction therewith, a National Conference opened on the 29th ult., at which Mr. Howard Williams represented his father, Sir George Williams, who was the cause of the formation of the Paris Association, and has been a generous supporter from its foundation. Mr. Williams, who received a very warm welcome, presented an Address of Congratulation on behalf of the Associations in the English National Union. This was received with much enthusiasm, the delegates standing while the band rendered the English National Anthem. Representatives were present from America, Sweden, Russia, and some twenty other nationalities, including Messrs. W. H. Mills, A. Brauon, and J. H. Putterill, of the English Union. The principal Protestant pastors of Paris, Professors of Theology, heads of Missions, and representative laymen, bore testimony to the great usefulness of the work.

The Universal Week of Prayer, which is observed by Associations throughout the world, commenced on November 9. It is the occasion of the preaching by clergymen and ministers in all parts of this country of large numbers of special sermons to young men. In Leeds, for example, no fewer than seventy-five such sermons have been arranged, and corresponding numbers have been promised in several other large centres. The speaker at the noon meeting at the Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. was Rev. H. E. Stone, who gave an earnest address on the prophecy of Zephaniah, applying the lessons of the prophecy to the great cities of to-day.

Light in Darkness.

IT is one thing to shut your eyes and pretend to be blind, opening them the next minute with the certainty that you are not, but quite another thing to be really sightless. If you had seen what I witnessed the other day, you would realize what a blessing eyesight is, and how much you need to thank God that you still possess it.

I was present at a tea and afterwards at a mission service held for 300 blind people and their guides. A lady, Miss Emery, had kindly invited them all to tea, and afterwards gave all the blind people a ticket for a sack of coals, and every guide a useful book. This she is also doing in ten other centres of the metropolis in addition to the one I visited. Isn't that a beautiful way of spending one's money?

As I watched these poor blind people, I wondered how you would like to be dependent on someone to lead you about everywhere, instead of being able to run upstairs, and slide down the bannisters and jump about as you do now! And supposing you had a splendid story-book given to you, and had to wait until someone could find time to read it to you! How sad it would seem, and how little after all you have to complain of!

A number of years ago a society was started called the Indigent Blind Visiting Society, for the purpose of helping these blind poor, and bringing sunshine to their darkened lives. Mr. Mead, the present superintendent of the Society, and his ten missionaries are all blind themselves; so you see when they visit the poor in their homes, they really know what blindness is like, and can help and sympathize all the better.

If you could speak to Mr. Mead and his missionaries, you would find them so bright and happy. You see they have learnt a secret which a great many people who can see have not yet learnt. They have let Jesus Christ into their hearts, and their lives are no longer dark and gloomy, but have become joyous and a blessing to others.

Perhaps you think that blind people are helpless and useless, but that is quite a mistake. Mr. Mead can work a typewriter, and in this way deals with his correspondence, and he can read as quickly with his fingers as you can with your eyes! Then several of the missionaries play and sing, which they find useful when they visit the blind in the workhouses. Mr. Mead told me one story in reference to this: When a blind missionary visits a workhouse, he reads so loudly that the other inmates of the room are attracted by the noise! Having secured their attention, he then starts to explain what he has been reading, and to sing to the people, and in this way gets an opportunity of reaching those who can see as well as those who are blind.

Did you ever imagine there could be a blind carpenter? There was once one; he had lost his eyesight through an accident. He was sitting sadly in his home thinking he should never be of any more use, but always be a burden to others, when Mr. Mead entered. "Well, Bill," he said, "what are you doing?" "Doing!" replied Bill, "Why, nothing, of course, I'm blind!" "Come, that's nonsense," answered Mr. Mead; "what were you before you became blind?" "A carpenter." Well, you must be a carpenter still," was the reply. £6 was collected for tools for Bill, and a shed hired in which to do his work, and he found he could still make knifeboards and housemaid's boxes, and when he got more accustomed to the darkness he launched forth into more complicated jobs, and now he makes chairs, tables, and the collecting-boxes for the Indigent Blind Visiting Society, which had brought to him new hope and courage. That was much better than remaining useless, and in similar ways the Society is helping other blind people to help themselves. Classes are held in which the blind are taught the Braille system of writing and reading, and it is surprising how patient and persevering these people are in their endeavours to master the secrets of the art. I saw several quite old women, under the instruction of another blind woman, plodding on in the study, and I could imagine how great their joy would be when they succeeded. It would be well if we were as persevering in overcoming our difficulties. Several girls were knitting socks and stockings, also crocheting shawls, and the needles clicked to and fro at such a rate!

One more story, which will show you how helpful the Indigent Blind Visiting Society is to others. There was a prize fighter, who lost the sight of both his eyes in a brawl with another man. This prize fighter had led a very wicked life. After he became blind he was visited by one of the missionaries, who told him of the love of God, and His power to save all who would come to Him. The man had often heard the story, but had never troubled to listen. Now it brought a peace to him which he had never experienced, and he determined to give up his wicked life and to follow Christ. To-day he is trying to tell other blind people the same glad story, and he says: "When I had my eyesight I was really blind; but now that I have lost my sight, I see."

These are only typical cases of many that are being helped both spiritually and physically. Mr. Mead is ready at all times to send out collecting-cards, or to suggest other ways in which help can be rendered. His address is: 95, Gurney Road, Leytonstone Road, Stratford, London, E. Perhaps you will be able to do something to help him to carry this message of hope and courage to blind sufferers, so that they may realize that—

> "There is no heart like the heart of Jesus
> Touched with our human woe,
> Not a throb nor a throe that we can know
> But He suffers it, too"— and then in their hearts will dawn the true Light which shall cast out the darkness. K. H.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

Sunday, November 16.

"For Me" (Isa. liii. 6; Luke xxii. 19, 20; Gal. ii. 20).

On the margin of an old painting by one of the great masters, the Latin equivalent of these words has been deciphered, Do not leave me out, O Lord. The theme of the picture was the healing of a multitude of sick folk by the Saviour; and evidently the old painter felt that he too needed healing, and that he must be included in the gracious operations of those hands.

But another and further thought is suggested in the verses quoted above. We learn, not singly that we may be included, but that we have been included.

Isa. liii. 6.—It is good to break the "All" with which the verse begins and ends into its individual constituents. The "All" in each case must mean each reader of these words, and each soul of man. When a stranger asked a friend of mine how he might find peace, the answer was, "Go home, find Isa. liii. 6; Go in at the first all, and come out at the last." A sentence which contained the Gospel in a nutshell, and led to the man's conversion.

All the sheep have not gone so far astray; all the sheep have not gone astray in the same direction; all have not got into the same pits and holes. But all have gone from the fold, and each has turned to his own way. "Each"—that brings home his and her guilt to each of us. "My sin is my own; I cannot put the burden on any fellow-man; and it is in some of its aspects unlike the sin which any other has committed. It is my own way. I have gone away from the fold; my sin swelled the torrent that was made to meet in Him; and unless the Good Shepherd had come to seek and to save me, I must have perished."

Luke xxii. 19, 20.—In Mark xiv. 24 the Lord uses the word many; and as we seek to know how many, and who, are included, our mind travels to Rom. v., where the word recurs so often; and there the Apostle makes it clear that it stands for all those who were included in Adam's sin. As "the many" were included in the results of the sin of the first Adam, so they are included in the results of the obedience of the one Man, Jesus Christ. And in each case the term includes the whole race of man.

Yes, the bread of our Lord's body was broken to be the food of the world, and the wine of His precious blood was poured forth for us all. And we have a right to eat and drink—each for himself and for herself. But there must be this personal and individual appropriation. It is not enough that Jesus has spread the table with provisions of priceless cost, each one of us must take and eat; must lift to his lips the cup and drink; must say in his heart: "I do now receive into my heart and life all the benefits which my Lord has obtained by His obedience unto death, and His ascension to the right hand of God."

Gal. ii. 20.—The Apostle feels himself to be singled out by the eyes of the dying Lord, as from some eminent portraits the eyes are fixed on you to whatever part of the room you remove, so that each person in the room feels that he is being scrutinized. As they stand on the shore at sunset, each individual in 10,000 thinks that the pathway of light from the low sun comes straight to his feet; so do the level beams of the great sunset come to each of us, as though the Lord died for him alone.

May we not dare to believe that the Lord loves each of us so much that if it had been necessary for Him to die for him only, He would not have hesitated? Is not this the meaning of the lost money-piece and the lost sheep? And may we not further believe that nothing less than the death of Christ would have sufficed for the salvation of any one of us? It is this that crucifies the love of sin, and makes each of us say, "The love of Christ constraineth me."

C.E. NOTES.

In the North Devon Union there are now thirty-nine Societies, with 1,488 members (900 being Church members), divided into 897 active members, 257 associates, 95 honorary, and 239 juniors; 62 associate members have joined the active list, and 105 actives have become Church members during the past year.

The Moravian minister at Kingston, Jamaica, gives a glowing account of his C.E. Society and its activities. "It was," he says, "the Y.P.S.C.E. that distributed 1,000 invitations to our week of prayer and evangelistic effort systematically within a specified area." Again, it was the C.E. Society which proposed and carried into effect a "lovefeast" in connection with our annual foreign missionary effort. The usual offering for mission work on the Moskito Coast, amounting to £2, was made by the Society, quite apart from the general mission offerings.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, November 23, 1902.

World's Temperance Lesson (Isa. xxviii. 1-13).

Golden Text.—Isa. xxviii. 7.

The prophecy from which the present lesson is taken was delivered three years before the fall of Samaria, and 700 years after the great national gathering of the tribes of Israel by command of Joshua at the same place (Jos. xxiv. 25). The twelve tribes had become two kingdoms, Israel ten, capital Samaria, Judah two, capital Jerusalem. Isaiah denounced the inhabitants of Samaria for their drunken evil lives, and prophesied their destruction. Warned Judah of a similar fate; but neither kingdoms heeded his words. Samaria fell before the Assyrians B.C. 722. Jerusalem was destroyed B.C. 586.

I. The Proud Crown of Ephraim's Drunkards.

The city of Samaria rested like a crown on the summit of an isolated hill which rose by a succession of terraces 600ft. above the valleys surrounding it. The battlemented walls of the city and the fertility of the vine-wreathed terraces lent illustration to the prophet's words. (At banquets of wine a crown was usually placed on the head of the host and garlands of flowers around the chief guests.)

Intoxicating drink robs us of—

Physical strength and beauty (vv. 1-4).
Mental power and right judgment (v. 7).
Liberty for action. "Wine pursues them" (Isa. v. 11 marg.)
Laudable ambition and self-respect (vv. 2, 3).
Love towards relatives. "Takes away heart" (Hos. iv. 11).
Health and purity (v. 8; Hos. vii. 5).
Sympathy, sense of justice (Amos iv. 1, vi. 1).
Care for the soul and eternity (Isa. xxii. 13).
Desire to know God (John xvii. 13).

II. The Glory Crown of the Residue.

Verses 5 and 6 sparkle like diamonds in the black coal-bed of judgment.

1. "The burden taken away, yoke off" (Isa. x. 27).
2. "The highway for the remnant left" (Isa. xi. 16).
3. "Take root downward, and bear fruit upward" (Isa. xxxvii. 31).
   1. Beauty and glory (Luke ii. 32).
   2. Wisdom and strength (Isa. xxvi. 4).
   3. "Glory in the midst of her" (Zech. ii. 5).

"For helmet, the hope of salvation" (1 Thess. v. 8).

"Jesus Thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress;
'Mid flaming worlds in these arrayed
With joy shall I lift up my head."

III. Judah's Threatened Ruin.

1. Drink lays claim on the high, as well as on humble folk (vv. 7, 8).

2. Makes even the Lord's watchmen blind (Isa. lvi. 10, 12), though they had been specially warned (Lev. x. 9), so that their judgment should not be warped from the judgment of the Lord. Ez. xliv. 21 and 24 (v. 7).

3. Changes men who have been taught to fear God into scorners (v. 9), mockers, and daring blasphemers (vv. 14, 15).

Lessons.

A nation is made up of individuals: God-fearing, righteous, temperate, or God-rejecting, unrighteous, corrupt. As each boy or girl, by the grace of God, strives to live a holy life, and use all their influence against the drink, they will help to make a God-fearing, temperance nation.

Drink spoils earth, and shuts out from heaven (1 Cor. vi. 10). Let us learn early, like the children of Rechab, to say "No!" when wine is put before us.

Judah and Israel would not listen and obey God through His prophet. He had to speak to them through foreign conquerers (v. 11 and Deut. xxviii. 27).

The secret of Israel's trouble was they did not listen and obey God's word (Psa. lxxxi. 11). The Voice that "speaketh from heaven" now will one day "shake not the earth only, but heaven also" (Heb. xii. 25, 26).

Illustrations of S.S. Lesson.

FADING AND FLOURISHING PEOPLE.

The degenerate tribes of Central and South Africa are to-day very much what strong drink has made them. Travellers find that whole districts have been demoralized by the intoxicating liquors introduced by unscrupulous traders. For their own selfish ends they have sought to undermine the health and the strength of many of the natives. On the other hand there are notable exceptions, and the people of Bechuanaland, who are under the rule of the chief Khama, are, perhaps, the most remarkable. Some years ago a new capital was built at Palapye, and astonishment has been expressed by all visitors at the beauty and completeness of the town. Such a condition exists because Khama, who is a Christian, forbids the entrance of "the white man's drink" to his own dominions. Among the African natives some of the proudest races have fallen because of drunkenness, and whether it be the people of Israel, of Ethiopia, or of Europe, woe is pronounced to the crown of pride, to the drunkards, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower (v. 1).

USELESS FOR STORMS.

In the United States it has been found that, despite the strength of the cedar tree, poles of that wood cannot be used for telegraphic purposes. When cedar was in vogue it lasted but a short time, and investigation revealed the fact that the poles were the homes of whole armies of insects. Woodpeckers were not long in discovering that this was the case, and in hunting the insects they literally honeycombed many of the poles. Strong as was the cedar, it was attacked by foes both from within and without. When, therefore, there came tempests of hail and destroying storms, the poles were cast down to earth. So was it with Samaria, the proud crown of Ephraim. The people, being drunk and unsteady, yielded to the inward and outward assaults of temptation, and Isaiah foretold that they should be trodden under foot by the Assyrians, who would come as a flood of mighty waters (vv. 2 and 3).

CROWNS OF PRIDE AND GLORY.

In the Middle Ages, May-day frolics and the crowning of the May-queen were events of great importance throughout the land. The fairest maiden was selected, and when the garlands of hawthorn had been gathered from the country side, a bower was made wherein sat the chosen queen of the year. Though the maypole and many other associations of the day have now disappeared, the custom still obtains in some localities, including certain of the suburbs of London, to crown the best girl of the community, and honour her as the queen of the year. The practice of selecting by beauty of conduct is preferable to the old custom of choosing by mere skin-deep beauty. Isaiah promised to the residue of the people, that if they would be warned by Samaria, the Lord of Hosts should be to them a crown of glory, in contrast to the crown of pride of Ephraim. Jehovah would also be for a diadem of beauty, if the people of Judah would prove themselves worthy of such a reward (v. 5).

TEMPTED, SNARED AND TAKEN.

One evening a naturalist, who was in a car of the Great Wheel at Earl's Court, was astonished to see a golden-crested wren fly in at the window. The little bird was doubtless in the act of migrating south to winter quarters, when in crossing London, it was attracted to its doom by the glare of the electric light. Surely this is a picture, not only of individuals, but of nations, to whom the allurements connected with their high positions and privileges have proved a fatal fascination. Israel and Judah, tempted from the path of rectitude, would not regard the Word of the Lord. In later times the Roman Empire fell a victim to the glare of sin and uncleanness, and any nation, or individual of a nation, who becomes infatuated and led astray, may go, as did the people in the lesson, and fall backward and be broken, and snared and taken (v. 13).

Yellow Fever in Mexico.

Orizaba, which has always been a refuge for the coast people of Mexico in times of yellow fever, is now being ravaged itself by the awful scourge. Many lives, both native and foreign, are being swept away by it, and as many as possible are now leaving the city. It is thought that the visitation may continue until January, when cold winds may destroy the mosquitos which are supposed to have carried the infection.

Prayer is specially asked for Mr. Eglon Harris and his fellow-labourers, who are carrying on such a remarkable work with Orizaba as their centre. May they, their families, and the many native converts be graciously preserved!

W. H. Stanger.

Rockfield House, Barnstaple.

Spain.—A Protestant church has been built at Cigales on a site provided by a Spaniard, and opened under the auspices of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society. The reformers not only gave the site, but a house to serve as the residence of the local minister. On October 2 over 250 crowded into the solidly-constructed building—erected at the expense of Mrs. Blackden in memory of her son who died in South Africa—and followed with interest the service of consecration, the ordination of a minister by Bishop Cabrera, and the administration of the Lord's supper to over thirty communicants. The work began through a villager reading the Bible in his own language, and gathering around him a group of Christians who now form the nucleus of the worshippers. That the battle of religious liberty is by no means won in Spain is proved by the receipt of news that a young man in a village near Salamanca has been sent to gaol for seven days because he held a service in his house.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Mr. Hugh Paton in Queensland.

MUCH interest has been aroused by Mr. Hugh Paton's mission in the Presbyterian church at Gladstone, Queensland. The congregations increased so much that the Theatre Royal was taken. A local paper says: "Mr. Paton, by his sympathy and kindliness, as much as by his eloquence, has won the hearts of the people. In Bundaberg the theatre doors had to be closed, and the people sent away. He proceeds to Childers, and, after one or two short missions, will begin a tent mission at Brisbane."

Miss Glover at Selkirk.

A fortnight's mission has just been concluded by Miss Kate A. Glover in the capital of Ettrick Forest. A grand work has been begun, many souls have been blessed, and the Kingdom has been added to daily by such as would be saved. The meetings have been under the auspices of the Railway Mission, whose members are thankful to the great Head of the Church for the seasons of refreshing sent them by the hands of the cultured young sister, whose ministry was very helpful to God's people, as well as much used in the conviction of the unsaved. The meetings will be continued, when the reaping time will, the saints are confident, bring in a bountiful harvest.

Rev. Dr. Torrey.

"The mission of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander in Wellington and further South," says the Christian Worker (Auckland, N.Z.), "has been wonderfully owned of God in the conversion of souls and the stirring up of Christians. Hundreds during the Wellington mission found life in Christ, and the largest halls procurable have proved all too small for the mighty crowds that have nightly thronged to the services. Dr. Torrey's Bible readings and addresses have been delivered with great power, and the effect has been most wonderful, while added to this has been the singing of Mr. Alexander, whose faculty is not alone in his own ability to sing, but in his success in getting the congregations to join in and sing the Gospel to themselves."

Stratford Conference Hall, E.

At this well-known hall in East London Mr. Charles Cook preached on the last two Sundays with much encouragement. An old man of over seventy was blessed, and came again full of thanksgiving and praise. A father wrote thanking God for his daughter's conversion, and a mother wrote praising God for "answering prayer for her dear boy." A young lady writes declaring her joy in the Lord since Sunday week.

The afternoon addresses to believers were helpful to many. The audiences were very large. A number of the workers are stirred up to special work on Sunday mornings, and are to hold open-air services among the many men who attend a neighbouring district to see football played on the Lord's Day.

Haddon Hall, Bermondsey, S.E.

Messrs. W. Olney and F. S. Johnson have held an encouraging ten days' mission at Haddon Hall, Bermondsey New Road, S.E. The audiences were large, the attention profound, and the inquiry-rooms well filled. Many strangers were gathered in, and a large blessing experienced amongst the usual attendants and the young people in the Sunday School. The results were seen in a meeting of ninety persons who professed conversion during the ten days; of these only thirty-five were children under fifteen, all the others being adults and young people. Many others who handed in decision cards were unable to attend this meeting, and we believe that the above figures would be largely increased if all the results were known.

H. Kilvington Olney,
Sunday School Superintendent.

Manchester City Mission, Ardwick.

A fifteen days' mission of a helpful character has just been concluded in the above place. The missioner was Mr. Charles Noakes, of the Evangelization Society. Much earnest prayer prepared the ground, and filled the workers with a spirit of expectation and holy enthusiasm. The workers mustered well night after night for the open-air meetings. The inside gatherings were most encouraging, and increased the second week both in interest and attendance. Mr. Noakes preached with power the Gospel of the grace of God, and sought to arouse the conscience and convince the mind with scriptural truth. Many were the interesting cases of those who professed to give themselves to the Lord; the apparently respectable have entered the Kingdom, along with the drunkard, the backslider, and the profane. Another blessed result is the deepening of the Christian life of the workers, creating a greater love for souls, and a stronger desire for aggressive service. "The Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad," and we praise God that the work of the Holy Spirit has been so manifest among us. J. Bostock, Missionary.

Missions in Glasgow.

A fortnight's mission, held in Trinity United Free Church, Charlotte Street, conducted by Mr. Andrew Ferrie, has been signalized by much blessing. The minister of the church, Rev. N. Macpherson, speaks of the mission as having been the means of great refreshing to the people of God, in addition to the conversion of some who had wandered far from God. Mr. Ferrie, who is a business gentleman, is an earnest, capable Gospel preacher, and has done a great deal of good work in the City for years in different churches and missions. His services are much sought after.

At Govanhill, in Hermon Hall, Mr. W. D. Dunn has just finished a three weeks' campaign. Mr. F. Leith, the superintendent of the Hall, and a band of helpers, have nightly stood by him, and through the preaching of the Gospel light has broken in on the darkness of some. Mr. Dunn has spoken with all his accustomed energy, and has interested many by his earnest presentation of saving truth. J. C.

Leighton Buzzard.

A united mission has been conducted at Leighton Buzzard by Mr. Leonard Weaver, in the Corn Exchange. It was preceded by a week of prayer, when meetings held in the Free Churches of the town were attended by about 200 people nightly.

The Holy Spirit's power was manifest in bringing Christians into a spirit of unity and earnestness. Bible readings and young people's meetings were held as well as the nightly mission services. A limelight lecture was given on the evening of Saturday week to about 1,000 children by Mr. Pallett, and later Mr. Weaver also lectured. Two men's services were conducted on Sunday afternoons, when several hundred men heard earnest words touching the claims of Christ upon their souls and lives, but the greatest good has come from the young people's services and the nightly evangelistic meetings; in some cases several members of a family have decided for Christ. Husbands and wives, too, have been brought into the new life. The committee, representing all the Free Churches and pastors, are thankful that the Lord directed the steps of His servant into our midst, and desire the prayers of God's people that grace may be given to shepherd the young converts and lead them in the ways of truth and righteousness.

F. Parsons, H. G. Pearson, Hon. Secs.

Rev. J. Tolefree Parr at Carlisle.

Rev. J. Tolefree Parr has just concluded a united ten days' mission, held under the auspices of the Carlisle Free Church Council. Interest was well maintained and great blessing resulted. At the service the last Sunday night so great was the crowd many were unable to gain admission to the Drill Hall. Mr. Parr gave a series of afternoon Bible readings from Monday to Friday, which were well attended. One of the chief features of the mission has been the deepening of the spiritual life of believers; in fact, Mr. Parr is of the opinion that if it could be so arranged an ordinary evangelistic mission should be preceded by a mission specially to believers. He also believes that no great mission is complete without the "Trinity of Evils"—gambling, intemperance, and impurity—being specially dealt with. The first he dealt with at a mass meeting for men only on the last Sunday afternoon, and on the last Saturday night a temperance gathering was held which resulted in 126 pledges being taken.

Owing to the short duration of the mission, Mr. Parr was unable to deal specially with "Impurity," and had to be content with a few telling words on it during his address on gambling to the men. During the mission eighty-nine persons passed through the inquiry room. R.

Mr. William Collard has conducted services at the Lighthouse Mission, Wilford Road, Croydon. Some of the roughest of characters were gathered in; the people came, some hatless and some coatless, but the Word was reverently listened to, and there were striking cases of blessing. One man, who with his wife and several children were brought to the Lord, closed his shop on the Lord's Day, and was overheard praying that his neighbours might take note of the closing, and realize that he had begun to serve God.

Rev. John M'Neill in Ulster.

Under the auspices of the Presbyterian General Assembly's Committee on Evangelization, Rev. John M'Neill conducted a mission in Newtownards from the 19th till the 26th ult. The services were held in the First Presbyterian Church. The seating capacity of the church is about 1,400, but by using forms and chairs about 1,600 persons were accommodated.

On the closing evening the church was crowded half an hour before the time of the commencement of the service, and hundreds, to their disappointment, found it impossible to obtain admission. The ministers of the six Presbyterian Churches in the town worked most heartily, and took part from time to time in the services, and large numbers of the members of other denominations and of residents in the surrounding districts and from the towns of Bangor and Donaghadee came as was convenient. A deep impression was produced by Mr. M'Neill's strong and faithful preaching, whilst his genial personality endeared him to the great mass of the people. It is believed that much good has been done in stirring up the careless as well as in confirming the faith of Church members.

The next day, October 27, Mr. M'Neill began a mission in the Town Hall, Newry. The preacher showed his power of stating the old Gospel in terse, trenchant, and familiar language, and presented the truth both as an appeal to the intellect and the heart. With searching scrutiny, he compelled his hearers to examine their habits and dispositions, thoughts, and arguments; and to face the question of their own need of a Saviour. On the Tuesday evening the subject was found in the words that had been instrumental in the conversion of the late C. H. Spurgeon, "Look unto Me and be ye saved." Starting with a description of the scene in the Primitive Methodist Chapel where Spurgeon heard and obeyed that word, Mr. M'Neill proceeded to turn the eyes of his hearers to the Saviour crucified for their offences, raised for their justification, and mighty to save. The Wednesday evening address was based upon the opening of the eyes of the man who was born blind. It was, perhaps, the most impressive of all. There was a freshness and a vigour of imagination that captivated every listener.

The concluding meetings were held on the Sabbath, at 3-30 and the other at seven o'clock in the evening. In order to allow of their members attending this closing service, not only the two Presbyterian churches but also the Covenanting and the Methodist churches were closed. The hall was thronged, and the missioner spoke with power to the vast audience. Argument had been followed by illustrations, and illustrations had been followed by argument, and both illustrations and argument had been accompanied with most pointed appeals, and the people seemed not to know the time was passing. Mr. M'Neill closed with prayer, and before the meeting separated Rev. Wm. Wylie, as the oldest minister present, spoke a word or two of thanks to Mr. M'Neill for the mission, which he said would undoubtedly prove a great benefit to the churches and to the whole community.

In St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Millwall (Rev. Wm. Ness), Mr. J. W. Moodie, soldier evangelist (of the London Evangelization Society), is conducting a most encouraging mission. The people are greatly interested, and attending in large numbers.

We have just concluded a fifteen-days' mission by Mr. A. Towers in the United Free Methodist Church, Glascote. Never have we seen such congregations in our church. Many have confessed the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour. Mr. Towers preached in a clear and emphatic manner, and his ministry was much esteemed. C.

The largest hall in Stirling was thronged on Sunday evening last at an evangelistic service, conducted by Mr. J. B. Wookey, who took for his subject John vi. 37. The occasion was one of deep solemnity as the preacher urged his hearers to seek the Saviour. Mr. Wookey told many pathetic incidents gathered during his long connection with Dr. Barnardo's Homes. W. B. E.

Mr. Charles Minor has conducted a series of evangelistic meetings in the mission church, St. John's parish, Tunbridge Wells. The attendances have been good, and it is believed that much blessing has accompanied the faithful preaching and singing of the Gospel. Mr. Minor continues his services in another part of the parish during the present week. G. E. Liebenrood.

In connection with the twenty-sixth anniversary of Shepherd Street Mission, Preston, Mr. Charles Mellor, of Newmillerdam, near Wakefield, has just concluded a twelve days' Gospel mission with much encouragement, some forty persons—young, middle-aged, and old—having decided for Christ under the gracious power of the Holy Spirit, while others entered into a deeper and fuller life. Mr. Mellor has a fund of rich, personal experience, which he gives out with telling effect, and is a strong advocate of Gospel temperance. J. Williamson, Hon. Secretary.

A correspondent writes:—"At Oyster Bay Township, East Norwich, Long Island, U.S.A., Rev. E. PAYSON HAMMOND has been assisting Rev. Robert Wasson, pastor of Wesley M.E. Church. At a Sabbath afternoon service, a good number of children yielded to the Saviour. Mr. Hammond on a subsequent day called at a neighbouring school, and while he was presenting to the children in tender words the great love of the Saviour, they were very deeply moved. All save one gave satisfactory evidence of simple child-trust in Jesus as their Saviour.

A fortnight's mission has been concluded by Mr. J. BENNETT ANDERSON at the Borough Road Mission Hall, Birkenhead. The power of the Spirit was felt, some of the unconverted were blessed, backsliders restored, and believers quickened. In one street, notorious for drunken squabbles, there has not been one disturbance during the mission. A Christian policeman says a spirit of quietness seems to have come upon the people, and many who for years the workers have been unable to reach have come nightly, and have accepted and are rejoicing in Christ. To God be all the praise. E. J. T.

At the Tabernacle, Whyteleafe, Surrey, the mission conducted by Mr. THOS. PAYNE, for which prayer was recently asked, proved a time of blessing. The addresses were full of the Scriptures, and on the subject of "Prayer" our brother was powerful. We have seen results, but are assured much more has been accomplished than what has appeared on the surface. The attentive congregations which gathered night by night in a village like this is in itself a proof of the Holy Spirit's working. As we asked for prayer we would as earnestly ask friends to join in thanksgiving. GERALD R. COULTAS, Pastor.

Under the auspices of the Free Church Council, Mr. "PADDY" NORMAN, the evangelist, from Newcastle-on-Tyne Wesleyan Mission, has concluded a ten days' mission at Old Hill, Staffordshire. Many sought Christ. On the Sunday evening the Methodist New Connexion Church was filled to overflowing. On Tuesday evening Mr. Norman conducted an evangelistic service in Hasbury (Halesowen) Primitive Methodist Chapel. The place was filled, and there were many inquirers. Throughout the mission Mr. Norman's knowledge of the Bible, and attractive delivery of the truth, were employed with striking effect.

At Bunyan Baptist Church, Stevenage, Mr. CHARLES GALLETLY, of the Evangelization Society, has just concluded a very successful fifteen days' mission. The lecture hall was well filled every evening. A marked feature of the meetings was the number of young men who came regularly throughout the mission. The closing meeting was held on Sunday, when the church was crowded in every part. Mr. Galletly spoke in the morning upon "The Second Coming of Christ," and in the evening based his discourse upon the words "In the beginning, God," from Gen. i. Following the after meeting, an informal praise meeting was held, when about twenty gave testimony to blessing received.

An eleven days' mission, conducted by Mr. WILLIAM LIDDELL, was held in the Friends' Meeting-house, Staines, from the 19th to 29th ult., inclusive. It was originally intended to close on the 26th, but, owing to the evident blessing and the fact that some were under conviction of sin, it was felt right to continue, with the result that the number of professed conversions was doubled. The numbers were well maintained, the attendance the last evening being double that of the first week-night. An encouraging feature was the number of men attending, on some occasions being one-half of the total, the proportion of conversions being almost the same. Bible readings were given every other week-day in the afternoon, and were well attended.

Church of England.

Wrexham Parish Church has just been restored at a cost of £10,000, and during the present week thanksgiving services are being held therein, the preachers including the Bishops of Bangor, St. Asaph, and Lichfield.

In explanation of the statement that certain C.M.S clergy at Sierra Leone were members of the E.C.U., the Sierra Leone Messenger says: "Several clergy had joined because they thus received religious papers and secured friends, but hardly in any case had they made a study of what this Society was advocating, and most of them, if not all, who belonged, have now resigned on being shown the position the E.C.U. holds in England,"

At a recent meeting the Governor of Newcastle Prison said:—"As a proof that the various agencies which are working for the reform of the criminal are not labouring in vain, I may say that there was a decrease of over 300 in the committals to Newcastle Prison during the first half of this year, as compared with the same period in 1901, and the Church Army, by its organizations, its Labour Homes and Prison Missions, has contributed in no small degree to bringing about this result."

The Bishop of Kensington presided on Friday last at a meeting held in the Portman Rooms, Baker Street, W., on behalf of the London Diocesan Police-court Mission. Rev. J. H. A. Law, secretary, stated that the mission employs thirteen missionaries, who are assisted in their labours by eight mission women. During the past year 25,349 visits were paid to offenders and police-courts, 2,012 cases were dealt with at the request of magistrates, and 747 men, women, boys, and girls were placed in situations. Sir Albert de Rutzen, chief metropolitan magistrate; Mr. S. Billington, missionary at Teddington, Sunbury and Staines; and Rev. E. A. Stuart, vicar of St. Matthew's Bayswater, also spoke.

Congregational.

Rev. Herbert J. Crouch has completed twenty years as pastor at Hersham, near Walton-on-Thames. Since his settlement about 220 persons have joined the church, and over £1,500 has been spent on enlargement and renovation.

Rev. Percy E. Bignell (late of Harley College), who was sent out to South Africa in June last by the Colonial Missionary Society, has been appointed to take charge of the large native work at Heidelberg, Cape Colony.

Rev. Samuel Naish has accepted the pastorate of Friernhay Congregational Church, Exeter. Rev. Samuel Wilson, who for some time has been connected with the work at Friernhay, will be associated with the new pastor as assistant minister.

Rev. Dr. Caleb Scott, chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, will retire from the principalship of the Lancashire Independent College, Manchester, at Christmas. For some time past Dr. Scott has been unable, on account of illness, to resume the duties of the principalship.

Baptist.

Pastor A. G. Mann has entered upon work as assistant to Rev. George Freeman at Westbourne Grove Chapel, W., for a period of six months.

Thank-offering Day at Chatsworth Road Church, West Norwood (Rev. Archibald G. Brown), realized £250. A house at the seaside has been offered rent free as a seaside home for the deserving poor of the church.

Rev. Charles Spurgeon has intimated his intention to resign the pastorate of the church at South Street, Greenwich, S.E., at the end of six months. This is the only church of which Mr. Spurgeon has been pastor, and he has held the position since 1879.

The resignation of Rev. G. Simmons, of Sidcup, is announced. In his letter to the church Mr. Simmons expressed his appreciation of the many tokens of love that he had received during the thirteen years of his ministry Mr. Simmons proposes to take a rest, and, when he feels sufficiently strong, to again take a pastorate.

At Wraysbury Chapel, Bucks, a recognition service in connection with the settlement of Mr. W. Blair Neatby, M.A., as pastor, was held on Thursday, the 6th inst. Pastor Jas. Stephens, M.A., of Highgate Road, presided, and gave an address on the threefold recognition of a minister—by his fellow-ministers, by the Church, and by God. Addresses were also given by Rev. Edward Brown, of Surbiton, and Rev. H. Gookey, of Staines. The meeting was well attended.

At Tower Street Church, West Hartlepool, Mrs. George Pyman has just re-opened the church and schoolroom, and also opened the new halls adjoining in Archer Street. The schoolroom has been enlarged by the addition of another story with eight class-rooms. Halls for young men and young women, respectively, have been erected, while the church has been thoroughly renovated. Rev. D. P. Packer preached the dedicatory sermon, and at a well-attended public meeting addresses were given by Sir Christopher Furness, M.P., the pastor, Rev. A. W. Curwood, and other friends.

Rev. H. E. Stone, the president of the Baptist Board, is making great efforts to increase its usefulness and interest, It has been arranged to hold meetings during the winter for the study of the Minor Prophets. Many ministers assembled recently at the Mission House, Furnival Street, E.C., at the first of these meetings, when a very able and interesting paper was read by Principal Gould, M.A., on the prophet Amos. The Baptist Board is a kind of Ministers' Fraternal. Its origin is lost in obscurity, but the minutes show an unbroken series of meetings from January 20, 1723.

On Thursday, October 30, the second anniversary of Rev. Percy J. Smart's settlement as pastor at Hornsey Road Baptist Chapel, N., was celebrated. A large congregation assembled for the public meeting which followed, presided over by Rev. James Stephens, M.A., of Highgate Road. Other speakers were Rev. G. D. Hooper, of Bournemouth, and Mr. Charles Cox. All these friends delivered inspiring and helpful addresses. The secretary reported that thirty-four members had been added during the year, making a total of seventy-two during the present pastorate. The meetings were most hearty and enthusiastic throughout.

Methodist.

Considerable progress is being made with regard to the payments of promises made to the Wesleyan Methodist Century Fund. Up to date 559 circuits have remitted to the central office in London the full amount they had undertaken to raise. The total amount received by the central committee in London is £913,580. The Chislehurst circuit heads the list with a contribution of £13,077.

The ninth anniversary of the Newcastle Wesleyan Mission, the third at its new headquarters, has been held. On the Sunday Rev. H. Howard May was the preacher. The three congregations testified to the hold that God has given him on the hearts of Newcastle folk. On the Monday Rev. Samuel Chadwick, of Leeds, preached to a full congregation in the afternoon, and at the night meeting Rev. D. L. Pawson (Superintendent of the Mission) gave a report glowing with enthusiasm.

Owing to the promise of Miss Fowler, of Liverpool, to give the sum of £20,000 for the founding of a new branch, the committee of the Wesleyan Children's Home and Orphanage propose to erect a building in the north of England to accommodate 300 additional children. They also have before them a proposal to erect a convalescent home for crippled children by the sea. Towards this project Mr. Joshua Locke, of Southport, and Mr. John Cory, of Cardiff, have promised £500 each if an additional £4,000 be secured.

The Wesleyan Methodists of Bristol have inaugurated a Forward Movement by holding services in the People's Palace on Sunday evenings. The venture has met with striking success. For the present the sermons will be preached by various ministers in the city, but the pastoral work is under the guidance of Rev. Albert Evans. At the opening meeting one speaker urged the desirableness of opening every theatre and music-hall in the city on Sunday evenings for evangelistic services.

Presbyterian.

Rev. P. Carmichael, who has just closed his pastorate of the church at Highbury, N., which he held for eighteen years, has been invited to take charge of the congregation at Enfield.

An iron church which has been erected in Ellesmere Road, Sheffield, in connection with the church extension scheme of the Yorkshire Presbytery, has been opened by Rev. Richard Leitch, of Newcastle. It takes the place of a mission station which during the past four years has been in charge of Rev. A. Aldridge, who will be the minister of the new church.

The anniversary services of the church at Ellison Street, Jarrow-on-Tyne, have been conducted by the Moderator of Synod, who preached deeply interesting and eloquent sermons morning and evening. In the afternoon the Moderator visited the Sunday fellowship class, and expressed himself greatly pleased both at the number and spirit of the members. This class is conducted under the presidency of Mr. William Golder, and forms a very efficient link between the Sunday-school and the church for young men and women.

Salvation Army.

During the coal strike in America the Army opened cheap coal depots for the poor, and thus relieved the needs of thousands.

The Premier of Ontario presided at General Booth's meeting in Toronto; 20,000 people attended the meetings held in the Massey Hall. So great were the crowds that the police had to barricade the approaches.

Since the death of Mrs. Goddard, of Stockton-on-Tees, the Mission associated with her name has been wanting a leader. The committee have now secured Mrs. Ada Surtees for the post. Mrs. Surtees has notable gifts for evangelistic work, and has laboured long and successfully in soul-winning in different parts of the country. An important branch of her work will be the Police Court Mission.

On Sunday last the 160th anniversary of the Church of the United Brethren was celebrated by a special service in our Fetter Lane Chapel. Rev. J. T. Waugh presided, and short, excellent, earnest addresses were given by Bishop J. H. Edwards, Rev. R. Elliott, Mr. G. Hieber, of High Barnet, and Mr. A. F. Mordaunt Smith. The collection was devoted to the Home Mission Fund.

A stirring prayer-meeting was held on Saturday, November 1, at Miss Child's "Welcome Home for Sailors," Canning Town, when many Christians pleaded till midnight for a revival in their own souls, in the souls of others, and for many conversions. The same subject was continued at the muster of the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" on Tuesday, November 3, when the text for the month given out by Miss Child was, "Wilt Thou not revive us again?" Mr. Wm. Luff, Mr. James Owen, and many others spoke with earnestness, and there is much expectation for blessed results.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. Edward Brown Spence, of Darlington, aged seventy-seven.—Rev. Thomas Thomas, of Goodshaw Baptist Church, Rossendale, Lancashire, aged fifty-three. After a five years' pastorate at Carmarthen, he settled in 1884 at Goodshaw, where his ministry brought much good to the church.—Rev. E. Roxburgh, M.A., B.D., minister of King Street Presbyterian Church, Oldham, aged thirty-nine. Two years ago he was Moderator of the Manchester Presbytery, and at the time of his death was Moderator of the vacant session at Blackburn.—At Bishopscourt, Miss Reeve, daughter of the Bishop of Meath, an earnest Christian worker.—At Ballyeaston, co. Antrim, Rev. Andrew B. Porter, Presbyterian minister, aged seventy-eight years.—At Ballineen, co. Cork, Rev. William Bell, M.A., rector of Killmeen, suddenly, aged forty-one years.

The Love of God.—Love uniteth the lover and the beloved. Love is the desire of the heart, ever thinking on that which it loveth. Love is a stirring of the soul to love God for Himself, and all other things for God. This love putteth out all other love that is against God's will. Love is a right will, turned from all earthly things, and joined to God—without departing, accompanied with the fire of the Holy Ghost; far from defouling, far from corruption, to no vice bowing, high above all fleshly lusts, ever ready to the contemplation of God. Without love no man can please God, with it no man sinneth to death. The child of the fiend it maketh the son of God, and partaker of the heritage of heaven.—John Wickliffe.

THE MORAVIAN MISSIONS (Established 1732).

Oldest Protestant Missions to the Heathen — First to the Lepers.

About ONE in SIXTY members is a missionary. There are gathered under their care, from darkest heathenism, nearly 100,000; i.e., more than THREE TIMES AS MANY as the parent Church!

To help these devoted people whom God so blesses, and who, in the preponderating proportion of their missionaries, are so largely doing the work of other Churches,

THE LONDON ASSOCIATION IN AID

was formed in 1817.

The following are some of many PRESSING NEEDS for which EARNEST PRAYER AND SUPPORT ARE SOUGHT—

For GENERAL FUND—largely increased annual help of at least £4,000, if existing Missions are to be maintained and deficiency averted.

For THE LEPER HOME, Jerusalem, where the Inmates have doubled in number, funds are still urgently wanted to defray the cost of the new Water Reservoir, &c.

For LABRADOR, hitherto self-supporting, but crippled for a time in its resources, £2,000 annually is required for a few years, until the Mission can be re-established. For this need and to avert loss to the General Fund, an ADDITIONAL Fund is being raised.

Contributions will be thankfully received and information given, by the Rev. W. Wetton Cox, at the offices of the London Association, 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn London, W.C., who will also gladly arrange for Meetings Sermons, Lectures, &c.

Notes & Comments

 Messrs. Morgan & Scott receive, acknowledge in The Christian, and transmit, donations sent to them in aid of any accredited Societies and Missions. To remove a misapprehension, it is added that no charge of any kind is ever made on such donations.

Foreign Advertisements. The proprietors of The Christian, having regard to the fact that certain persons on the Continent use the columns of English papers for inserting advertisements of an apparently innocent character, but with an evil purpose in view, find it necessary to require references with advertisements for the services of young women in any capacity. This is obviously in the interest of bonâ fide advertisers and of those to whom such advertisements are addressed. All persons answering such advertisements in any paper should also require full references before entering into negotiations.

The Visit of the Kaiser. Anything that will help to destroy the ill-will existing between this country and Germany is to be heartily welcomed. It is useless to disguise the fact that Anglophobia has greatly increased during the last three or four years among the subjects of the Kaiser. If certain extreme German statesmen and certain rabid journalists could have their way, there would speedily be war between the two peoples. The presence of the Kaiser amongst us ought to do much good. The Bishop of Ripon plainly said this in his sermon before the Royal Family at Sandringham. It is the business of Christian men to do all possible to foster the feeling of goodwill between two nations so closely bound together by blood and temperament as England and Germany.

The Government and the Education Bill. On every ground it is exceedingly regrettable that the Government has resolved, by its application of the "compartment closure" to the Education Bill, to practically stifle all free discussion concerning a measure to which a considerable part of the country is determinedly opposed. It is an unprecedented thing to do, and the doing of it only makes it more clear that private, and not public, interest is behind it. To plead "urgency" is irrelevant. If the present system has worked well for thirty-two years, why this excessive haste to rush through a measure which, at one blow, will overturn what has proved beneficial for a third of a century? Mr. Balfour has plainly shown his hand; he will listen to nothing, nor will he heed the voice of the recent elections, nor the protests of several millions of voters.

Dr. Chavasse's Firmness. The Bishop of Liverpool, in delivering his charge to the clergy of his diocese, made it clear that he intends to deal quietly but firmly with those recalcitrant clergymen who "hold almost every Romish doctrine, and yet contrive to satisfy their consciences that they can honestly remain in the Church of England." The policy of inactivity is simply cowardly; that of prosecution has failed conspicuously; but the policy of Dr. Chavasse in resorting to episcopal excommunication will not fail of its purpose, for it hits the nail on the head. His lordship simply declines to assist at their services, to preach in their pulpits, to confirm in their churches, or to license any assistant clergy, where these Romish practices prevail. It is the only thing to do, and it is surprising that other Bishops, who have spoken so strongly against these practices, have not done the same. When action of this kind is taken, Evangelical Churchmen will believe in the sincerity of the frequent lamentations that have been made.

A Trenchant Charge. In the Ladies' League Gazette, Chancellor J. J. Lias gives excellent expression to the growing dislike of the laity to the growing pretensions of the priest in English life:—

> The intelligent layman will never look up to a man—and there are too many of them just now—whose attention is fixed on vestures, postures, and gestures, and who is unhappy and uncomfortable at services in which his favourite vestures, postures, and gestures are not permitted. The intelligent layman will never believe that if he partakes of a cup of tea and a piece of bread and butter before partaking of Holy Communion he is guilty of mortal sin—a sin, I presume, therefore, which is on a level with murder and adultery. You will never persuade him that it is his duty to confess his sins in the minutest detail to a priest, and that if he neglects to do so there is grave doubt whether his sins will be forgiven at all. His mind is on a different plane to that of the clergyman whose teaching is of this description. There can be no sympathy between them on religious subjects.

The Children's Confessional. Those who disregard the lessons of history and look with equanimity upon the subtle introduction of the Confessional into a section of modern religious life, may well take warning from the extracts from a sermon recently preached at St. Barnabas, Oxford. The preacher, dealing with the question whether young people ought to go to confession without their parents' leave, answered it Jesuitically, and actually pointed to "the child Jesus," who on one occasion tarried behind in Jerusalem "though Joseph and His mother knew it not," as an illustration of the thesis that there may be circumstances under which "parental authority must bow to that of the power which created it." Of course, it follows that the priest must decide when the child must "say its prayers" or "attend to other religious duties" against its parents' will. Here as elsewhere, the priest in so-called "sacramental confession" breaks through the sacred barriers of the family, and aims at the man and the woman through the child.

The Test of Missionary Effort. The article by Mr. Eugene Stock on "Missions" in the new supplementary volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica is full of striking and convincing facts regarding the many and happy fruits of missionary effort; but there is a weighty passage against measuring their benefits by the mere outward results. Mr. Stock says:—

> Results, however desirable, are no certain test of a mission doing its work. A mission in Persia, with its handful of converts, has, on this view, as much right to support and appreciation as a mission in southern India, with its tens of thousands. Again, on the hypothesis that Christianity is true, the statistics at a particular period are no test of success at all. For in them the dead are not counted; and the converts who are already dead are—at least in respect of individual salvation—the surest of results. If, however, we are to take statistical returns for what they are worth, it is estimated that the Christians in heathen lands gathered by Protestant missions probably amount to four millions, and . . . a similar total may be ascribed to Roman Catholic missions, making eight millions in all. This, however, includes adherents still under instruction for baptism, and their children. The inner circle of communicant members is not more than one-third of the total.

These wise words will find their way into minds that otherwise know little of the priceless boon to civilization as well as religion which has come through the missionary efforts of the last century.

The Supreme Place of Atonement. That a fresh interest is being shown, not only in the life and teaching of Christ, but also in His atoning death, is manifested by the appearance of fresh works on that ever-fruitful subject. One of the best of these is Dr. Denney's newly-published volume on "The Death of Christ," the special emphasis of which may be inferred from the words with which the work closes.

> The more one dwells in the New Testament, and tries to find the point of view from which to reduce it to unity, the more he is convinced that the Atonement is the key to Christianity as a whole.

This is a "note" of the Gospel that has been sadly neglected of late, for the human life and teaching of Jesus has bulked so largely in the preaching and theological literature of the time that the dark event of Calvary, through which so much light has streamed on sin and redemption, has been, for the time, largely ignored, and relegated to a secondary place in the thought and worship of believers.

The Liverpool Religious Census. The Liverpool Daily Post has published the results of a census of church attendance taken on November 2. The figures are very striking. During the decade from 1892, the percentage of attendants at public worship has not kept pace with the growing population, so that, while actually the number of attendants is greater than ten years ago, there is, proportionately, a decline in numbers. Only about one-seventh of the population was present at the evening services in the city. We do not refer to this census in any pessimistic spirit, but we think it ought to make, not only Liverpool Christians, but Christians everywhere, seriously think. It is curious to note how the daily newspaper is taking up the matter of Church attendance. We have had quite a number of similar investigations lately, and we believe that London is shortly to be canvassed in the same manner. Some good will be done if the Church is really awakened to the fact that the great majority are outside her doors. It may be that this revival of the religious census is one of God's ways to drive the Church to prayer and to renewed endeavour for His kingdom.

The Lone Young Men of London. We heartily welcome another of the practical schemes for sheltering the lonely young men of London from the temptations of the city, and providing for them something like home life away from home. This latest attempt, supported by the Bishop of London, provides in a healthy suburb high-class accommodation for young men with the advantages of recreation and library and healthy society. There is to be no element of charity in the scheme—it will be upon a sound commercial basis. There is no doubt that thousands of young fellows go wrong for lack of healthy society in what has to be to them home life. The solitude of single lodgings drives many men upon the streets, and sends them into the jaws of temptation. A life that lacks the natural element of sociability is bound to be the opposite of healthy. Great numbers of young men who come up to London have been associated in the country with church or Sunday-school, but in the city they soon drift off unless they are held on the social side, as they were in the country. It is surely the work of the churches to claim and to hold these young men, by securing for them as far as possible, society which is safe and healthy.

Alcohol and the Army. The letter of the Archdeacon of Gibraltar in last Thursday's Daily News upon the consumption of alcohol in the Army, is a startling piece of writing, and to many people its revelation will come as a most painful surprise. Our statesmen and judges are always deploring the fact that drunkenness is rampant, yet it is clear that both in the Navy and the Army the authorities are unblushingly training men to be victims of alcoholism. Archdeacon Govett points out that despite the strong evidence adduced by Lord Napier and Lord Wolseley as to the criminal effects of alcohol in the Army (nearly 90 per cent. of the crime being attributed to it), and despite the evidence of statistics, science, and experience, the lads of both our Army and Navy are daily dosed with intoxicants. The marine, at the age of twenty, is served every day with his tot of rum, and cheap drinking canteens are regimental institutions. Until these customs, supported by high authority, are destroyed, we shall have the shameful vices which send men to hospital or prison flourishing both in the Army and the Navy What is the use of "discipline" for the body, if there is no discipline applied to the appetite?

Drink and the Drama. Is there any basis for the plea so generally put forward that the sale of intoxicants at places of public amusement is called for in the public convenience, and is carried on in deference to the public wish? In a recent case in which the licensing authorities of the London County Council wisely refused a drink licence for a theatre, it was stated that since the Council had enforced regulations preventing the sale of intoxicants in this and other places of amusement, the houses where the restriction is applied are "among the most successful." But constant vigilance is needful. It is a common trick of lessees of new buildings to obtain a licence in the first instance, on the ground that no drink is to be supplied, and, a year or two later, to apply for a drink licence on the plea that they should be put on the same footing as others which possess it.

A Belgian Band of Hope. The managers of the Public School System in Belgium some years ago adopted a very practical way of helping the temperance movement in that country, and their method is one which might with advantage be followed in these islands if we had an administration less tied to the drink trade. In Belgium there is an annual "pledge day" in the schools, when the parents are requested to attend, and each scholar who has reached twelve years of age is invited to take a pledge of total abstinence from intoxicants for eight years. It is found that most of the young people remain faithful to their engagement even after the period has expired, and that a great army of total abstainers is thus being formed throughout the country. In Belgium, however, the welfare of the people is considered paramount to that of the brewer and distiller, and of greater importance than a revenue based largely upon degradation and crime.

Death of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.

FROM the front rank of preachers of the Gospel in this country the form of one of its most popular members is missing this week. Though he has been suffering from ill-health for a year and a half, the home-call which came to Rev. Hugh Price Hughes was yet startlingly sudden in character.

In the afternoon he attended the autumn session of the Christian Conference — an organization with which he had the warmest sympathy—at Sion College, Thames Embankment, when Mr. Percy Bunting read a paper, prepared by M. Paul Sabatier, on St. Francis of Assisi and the Twentieth Century. At that time he appeared in his usual health. He left for home in company of one of the Sisters of the West London Mission; but before he had walked far he showed symptoms of faintness. The Sister promptly called a cab; but before reaching his own house Mr. Hughes had lost consciousness, which he never recovered. He was carried to his room, and the doctor summoned; but the great Wesleyan leader was beyond human aid. He breathed his last within an hour of reaching home.

Born at Carmarthen, this great preacher was the son of the late Mr. John Hughes, a prominent man in the town—surgeon, coroner, senior magistrate, and chairman of the School Board. The grandfather was a distinguished Wesleyan minister, the first Welshman ever elected to the "Legal Hundred," the supreme, authoritative council of Methodism. It was from this fiery old Welsh orator, that the name "Hugh" was derived, and from him, doubtless were also inherited those qualities of mind and temperament which once led a local preacher impatiently to describe him as "the firebrand of Methodism."

The career planned for the boy by his parents was a legal one. At school in Swansea, however, he "found Christ," and forthwith made new plans for himself. With a premonition of the directness which marked his later preaching, he at once announced to his father his desire to be a Wesleyan minister. This was a source of no disappointment at home. The father, who had remained true to the Church of his youth at a time when a heavy price had to be paid for the privilege of nonconformity, rejoiced in the fact that his promising eldest son should thus devote himself to the preaching of the Gospel.

From the first, Mr. Hughes was a believer in the printed message, his earliest effort in definite Christian work taking the form of tract distribution. He obtained from the Religious Tract Society a shillingsworth of tracts, and remembered to the end the glow of delight that thrilled him when he received the packet. Then he called at a cottage not far from the school, and asked leave to conduct a Gospel service there. Consent was given, a bargain come to as to remuneration, and arrangements were completed. Two school-fellows helped all they could, and the preacher of fourteen found himself telling the old, old story, of which he never grew tired, to an audience of six or seven old people. The text was, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."

He never looked back. His trial sermon before the district meeting was preached when he was about seventeen. So youthful was his appearance that when he went on one occasion, with two companions, to keep an appointment as local preacher, the chapel keeper thought the boys were "larking," ordered them to go and sit in the gallery, and admitted afterwards that he had intended to keep a sharp eye on them to prevent anything of the nature of mischief.

Receiving his theological training at Richmond College, Mr. Hughes proved his scholarship by graduating at London University. His first circuit appointment was at Dover, and his years there are remarkable for his first appearance as a temperance advocate. The itineracy system took him in turn to Brighton, Tottenham, East Dulwich, Oxford, and Brixton.

The name of Hugh Price Hughes will, however, always be thought of in connection with the West London Mission. That method of work had been adopted in the East End, but it was left for him to demonstrate that it could be successfully carried into and adapted to the needs of the West End also. The difficulties to be overcome were immense, but those who are familiar with the efforts carried on at St. James' Hall and its offshoots are full of gratitude to God for a leader who had the courage of his convictions.

The editorship of the Methodist Times would have been enough to fill up the life of any ordinary man, but with him it has had to rank only as one of a number of activities. He has, however, used his journalistic opportunity right well. The Gospel has ever been kept in the forefront; social and temperance questions have been helped forward with great power; such denominational movements as the spread of the great "Missions" and the Twentieth Century Fund owe very much to his advocacy, and a very determined stand has been made in the matter of the Education Bill.

A subject on which Mr. Price Hughes pondered long and deeply was the possibility of the union of Christian churches. In 1892 he brought forward at Grindelwald a scheme for the reconciliation of Dissenters with Churchmen; but when it became evident that there was no hope in this direction, he became one of the prime movers in the union of the Free Churches, being one of the earliest presidents of the National Council. He was deeply impressed with the idea that the Christian Churches were not aware how mighty they would be if they would only "pull together." They could, he said on one occasion, prevent war and bring about many beneficent reforms if they would do so.

TRIBUTE FROM MR. HENRY VARLEY.

A born leader, his sanctified manhood was world-wide in its sympathies, power, and outreach. Upon whom shall his mantle rest? Where are the young men who, perchance, like Elisha of old, are saying, "My Father, my Father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof," and shall say, "Here am I, send me, send me," if by any means we can do something to fill the sad gaps that are made as the leaders are gathered home? Our deep sympathy with the beloved widow and family, as with the great people among whom he was a prominent leader, is heartily but sorrowfully tendered. May our Great and Living Lord's voice be heard again by us all, "I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and he that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." Death, indeed, to those who are in Christ is swallowed up in victory. Wherefore comfort one another with these words. Farewell for a little, beloved fellow-labourer, till the resurrection morning breaks, and the shadows flee away.

The Outpoured Spirit.—5.

SAMARITANS AND GENTILES.

I WISH heartily to recommend to all who are seeking the abiding fulness of the Spirit for themselves, or urging it on others, a brief manual entitled, "The Threefold Secret of the Spirit." It may be obtained freely on application to "Regions Beyond Missionary Union Publication Department, Harley House, Bow, London, E." Its issue is supported by voluntary offerings. Its point of view and its exposition is precisely that of these papers, although it had not been read before the earlier ones were written.

The distinction between the Incoming of the Spirit the moment we believe, and the Fulness of the Spirit consequent upon "the absolute, unqualified surrender of our life to God, to do His will instead of our own"—whether this takes place at conversion or, as is far more frequently the case, at a subsequent time—I heartily accept and endorse, as well as (speaking generally) the teaching of every chapter. It is a luminous and enlightening essay; I would that every Christian might read and study it, meditate on and give himself wholly to the truths propounded and proved in it; read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them; that his progress may be manifest unto all. In doing so we shall acquire an ever-deepening conviction of our need, and an ever-increasing assurance of the possibilities of victory over the world, the flesh, and the evil one.

There is, however, one passage in which I think an inadequate and incorrect view is taken of the first preaching of the Gospel in Samaria. See page 36 of the pamphlet. The narrative is used only as an illustration of a truth; therefore it is not the point made, but only the illustration, which fails. The passage reads as follows:—

> Take the case of the Samaritans recorded in Acts viii. 5-25. "Here," it is said, "we are distinctly told that they believed Philip as he preached Christ, and that they were baptized" (v. 12). True, there certainly was at least an intellectual belief in the Lord Jesus Christ. Why, then, was the Holy Ghost not received? Since, as we have seen, God distinctly says that He will be received if men but repent and believe, the fair inference would be that they had not honestly repented. We believe this to be a case where the other condition was lacking, even though they professed faith in Christ. This was surely the case with one of them. For Simon, the sorcerer, had professed belief and been baptized at this time (v. 13), and yet Peter declared to him, "Thy heart is not right with God."

To make Simon the representative of all who believed at Samaria contradicts the statement that they had received the Word of God, which Peter and John did not call in question. No one can receive the Word of God without repentance. It also entirely misses the significance of the facts.

In order to the comprehension of this vital subject of the gift of the Holy Spirit, we must reflect that three questions naturally and inevitably arose after Pentecost.

1. The 120 who, according to the Lord Christ's promise, were baptized in the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost (Acts i. 5; ii.) were all Jews. Could it be that Samaritans should be made to participate in the same baptism? And, if so, would the Jewish believers recognise them as brethren beloved, partakers of the benefit? For Jews had no dealings with Samaritans.

2. Would it be possible that uncircumcised Gentiles, whom the Jews regarded as "dogs," should receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, and become fellow-members of the Church of God, on an equal footing with the Church of the elect nation, baptized on the appointed day of Pentecost?

3. What is the faith which justifies the believer, and secures the gift of the Holy Ghost?

4. To which another question may be added. Even supposing that Samaritans and Gentiles could have received the promised Spirit, had not the day passed, the fiftieth day from the resurrection, the day after the seventh Sabbath, the day on which the promised Spirit was poured forth? (Lev. xxiii.)

It may not have occurred to the Jews at Jerusalem to ask these questions. It seems probable that they may have occurred to the angels, who earnestly desired to look into the things of the Gospel. But in any case they were in the mind of God, and were successively answered by events recorded in Acts viii., x., xviii., xix.

THE SAMARITANS.

1. "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon." "Shall we call down fire from heaven and consume them, as Elias did?" These passages show the estimation in which the Samaritans were held by the Jews, and suggest that nothing less than a great persecution would have led to the evangelization of Samaria by the Jerusalem Jews. Even then, it was the Evangelist Philip, of Cesarea, who carried the glad tidings to Samaria. We may well conclude that there would have been a very strong Jewish prejudice against receiving the Samaritans as brethren beloved, partakers of the benefit of the outpoured Spirit. Therefore the wise grace of God so ordered it that Peter and John, the two chief Apostles, should be sent by the rest of the Apostles to Samaria, and that that mongrel people, hitherto so bitterly despised, should receive the Spirit in answer to the prayer and by means of the laying on of hands of the apostolic deputation from Jerusalem itself.

This, I think, sufficiently shows that the falling of the Spirit on the baptized believers at Samaria was delayed for a special purpose, so that He might be received in such wise that Samaria's share in the fulfilled promise might never afterwards be called in question.

THE GENTILES.

2. "And He said unto me, Depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. And they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live." "Not so, Lord, for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean. . . . Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons." "Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." These passages indicate the intense and deeply-rooted exclusiveness with which the Jews regarded the Gentiles. Therefore Peter's trance and Cornelius's vision. Therefore spontaneously and unexpectedly "the Holy Ghost fell on them (says Peter) as on us at the beginning."

That God should have dealings with the despised Samaritans on the same terms as with the Jews themselves, was a sufficient shock to ancestral and educational pride; but that the middle wall of partition should be broken down, and Gentile dogs enter the garden of God, would seem a superfluity of naughtiness to the inhabitants of Jerusalem and men of Judah. "For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah His pleasant plant."

How gradually this weed of Judaism was rooted out of Peter himself, his blameworthy trimming at Antioch bears witness; and how it troubled the early Church is abundantly evident in the Acts and the Epistles.

While, therefore, it was in answer to the Apostles' prayer that the Samaritans received the Holy Ghost, it was by God's own act and deed from first to last, and in marked contravention of all precedent, without their waiting, without their praying for it, without baptism, without laying on of hands, while Peter spake—yea, while he began to speak, suddenly the Holy Ghost fell on the Gentiles in Cæsar's city, as on the Jewish disciples on the Day of Pentecost; in the presence of the six brethren from Joppa, with the Apostle—not two or three, but seven Jewish witnesses.

If the inclusion of the Samaritans is placed beyond question, still more emphatically is it declared from Heaven that the Spirit is given without measure to all who believe; seeing that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so has the Son of Man been lifted up; and lifted up not only in shame upon the cross, but in glory to the right hand of the Majesty on high. The two remaining questions will be answered next week. M.

Deeds that Endure.

DEEDS done in the Spirit of God cannot possibly lose their value. They may be misunderstood and opposed—yea, they may totally disappear from the eye of man—yet shall they abide, and be found "unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

Science has much to say about the conservation of energy. We are told that energy in the physical universe, while constantly transformed, is not lost. For example, when the movement of a body is arrested, that very arrest is accompanied by a proportionate rise of temperature; the friction that diminishes speed increases heat. In the spiritual universe also, God has His method in a conservation of energy. "His word shall not return unto Him void; but it shall accomplish . . . it shall prosper. . ."

God's will is that very much of His work should advance unseen, just as the primary service of that rain from heaven (Isaiah's emblem) is not to swell the rivers and bear up the heavy-laden ships, but to nourish life in food-bearing plants. Indeed, spiritual things are by their very nature unseen. We can trace them only by their working out upon, and in connection with, the great external drama.

Now in this great drama all effects are complex; all effects have come to pass by a multiplicity of means, and from a multiplicity of causes. We are never sure how much of the apparently good is the index of a good will. Still less can we be sure that the apparently bad is of any permanent signification. Only God can discern the breath of Satan, in the kiss of Judas, and a faith that will not fail, in the heart of boastful, yea, blaspheming, Peter.

It is through overlooking fundamental principles like these, that we are often so discouraged, or so prematurely elated. We ask for signs—ever a mark of unbelief. We fret because no outward change, commensurate with our labour, is visible. Faith works by love, and waits upon God; and knows that Love is invincible, and that God is never behind time. In every spiritual process, the outward change is the last step. The Christian life consists of a ceaseless succession of such processes, each of which gets its initial impulse, and its continuance from within. Here is the source of all deeds that endure—"It is God that worketh in you."

Irish Church Missions.—Much satisfaction is felt in Belfast at the reversal of a decision by the resident magistrate, who fined a colporteur of the I.C.M. for an alleged assault by striking a R.C. woman, at whose door he was offering books for sale. Those who know the colporteur regard him as incapable of such an act; and his Honour, Judge Fitzgibbon, in the Recorder's Court, found the woman's story to be untrue in several particulars. He considered that no jury could convict, and reversed the magistrate's decision.

Rome and Education.

By Mr. HENRY VARLEY.

NOTHING is more profoundly interesting in connection with the study of the Word of God in relation to past history than to observe the working of the overruling hand of the living God. This is equally true in regard to national history since the canon of the sacred Scriptures closed. The centuries which have passed yield abundant evidence of the fact, and present-day experiences confirm the same truth. The attempt being made on the part of Rome at this time to undermine the faith of Christ by using the Anglo-Catholics to bring in the Education Bill would, without question, bring to the front the same overruling hand.

The nation had fallen on sleep in regard to Roman Catholic subtlety. The warning word of Christ Jesus the Lord has aroused us, and the nation is awaking to quick and keen perception.

It is now clear as daylight that the intention of the Education Bill, so far as Mr. Balfour is concerned, is totally different from that of the High Church and priestly party at whose instigation the Bill was originally planned. The revolt of the Anglo-Catholics proves this to demonstration. This is the Lord's doing, and we rejoice in His working. He knows right well what has been the result to education of the great anti-Christian system which centres in the Pope. He has seen it in the colonies, cities, states, islands, continents, of the earth, and just recently in the schools in France.

Rome for her own despotic interests has made the Education question in all these places a cause of dissension, division, bitterness, and quarrel. To crush human liberty, to enslave the human mind, and to keep in ignorance, under the heel of a tyrannical priesthood—such has ever been the history of Rome in relation to education and true liberty amongst the nations where her sway has extended.

Christ Jesus the Lord, the Head and centre of rallying to the Church, said in His first address in the synagogue at Nazareth: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the Gospel to the poor; He hath sent Me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Herein is rung out the mind of the Eternal God—here is the death-knell of slavery in every form, whether physical, intellectual, or spiritual. No wonder that Rome has forbidden the circulation and reading of the Bible. God's priceless and inalienable charter, Rome has burnt, and with brute force kept from the people. The words just quoted give from Christ, the Head of His Church, His charter of our civil and religious liberty.

Is it matter for surprise that Rome, which loves despotic power, has rejected the Christ of God, and into His supreme position has had the temerity to exalt a long line of Popes, whose personal character and conduct, in numerous instances, has been utterly corrupt and tyrannically cruel? It would be impossible to conceive a greater contrast than that which has existed and still exists between the Holy One of God, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Popes of Rome. The noontide light of the sun and the black darkness of midnight do not yield a stronger contrast.

The lapse of times of quiet, the fascinating guise which has been put on by the Roman Catholic priests in England, the appeals which a sensuous and florid ritual, with its high altars, masses, anthems, and richly-dressed priests since the Catholic Emancipation Bill became law, all this is well known. These have represented the policy of Rome whilst waiting and seeking industriously to undermine Protestantism, and what is painfully true, to counterfeit the Church of God. In proof of this, let it be clearly borne in mind that Christ Jesus the Lord, the Head of His Church, never gave a priest as His gift. Let Ephes. iv. be consulted. When our Lord ascended up on high He gave to His Church "some prophets, some apostles, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministering." But mark it well! There is no mention of the priest. Nor could He have given priests. Sacrifice was for ever at an end, when the Lord Jesus Christ by one offering of Himself made an end of sin and perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

The whole Church of Christ, comprehending every member, represents a "holy priesthood," not for or in any sacrificial or sacerdotal sense, but to "show forth His praises who called them out of darkness into His marvellous light." If there is a priest on the face of the earth to-day in any sacerdotal, mediatorial, or sacrificing sense, then Jesus Christ has not died, neither has He risen again, nor is He at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens. But Christ has died, and is risen again, and is at the right hand of God. He alone is our Great High Priest, able to save for evermore, and making intercession for all who come unto God by Him.

If any man, Pope, Cardinal, Prelate, or Presbyter, affirms that he is a priest in any other sense than that which applies to the whole Church of God, he states what is absolutely false, and on his own admission shows that he is not Christ's gift—the conclusive reason being that Christ never gave a priest—proof that sacrificial function was at an end.

This Education Bill, with its priestly and Romanizing advocacy, is now rousing the opposition of the people of England. It is emphatically a measure seized upon by the priests of Rome and the Anglo-Catholics to increase their power, at the expense, not of Protestantism only, but of that priceless heirloom of British freedom.

Many of these schools are to be dominated in management and sectarian teaching by the priestly party. This is plainly to the front. Cardinal Vaughan's circular asking the prayers of the faithful that the Government may pass the measure is obviously a covert attack, not upon Protestantism only, but upon civil liberty, Here is the wedge which, fashioned at Rome, has captivated the Anglo-Catholic priests, who would work the Education Bill for all it is worth in order to undermine our national Board School system.

The fact is, we do not want any system of sectarian education in England. We want the freedom and liberty of Christ, with His Word having free course amongst the children and the people.

Large numbers of Christian ministers, teachers, and others, will be thrown together by the force of this attempt to get the education of many thousands of the youth of England into the hands of Romish and sectarian ecclesiastics. Denominational differences will be a diminishing quantity as we rally together against the well-known foe.

The much-needed separation of the incongruous elements in the State Church will be hastened. Romanizing bishops and Anglican priests will be forced out from the dishonest positions which they still hold.

It has been well said, that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and the watchman on the walls of Zion will henceforth neither slumber nor sleep. The United States are before us, an object-lesson. So, also, the compulsory closing of the schools in France. Christ's own word to his people at this time is "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord," and "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"

Come Unto Me.

(Matt. xi. 28)

Does your cross seem very heavy?
Does the devil tempt you sore?
I will give you rest, and lead you
Safely now and evermore.

Come to me, ye heavy laden,
At My feet your burden cast,
I will gladly bear it for you,
And will bring you home at last.

To the promised land I'll bring you,
Be your Guardian all the way,
Bring you through this night of sorrow
Into everlasting day. H. W. H.

An Indian Priestess.

AMONG our fellow-subjects in Britain's great Eastern Dependency, not a few men have, for good or evil, become known in this country by name and career; but of the great multitude of India's daughters a very small company indeed have risen above that terribly monotonous level in which no individuality is recognizable. The story of Pandita Ramabai has claimed for itself a warm place in the regard of Christians all over the world. Well worthy to be ranked alongside her biography is An Indian Priestess: the Life of Chundra Lela, by Ada Lee. (1s. 6d. net. Morgan & Scott.)

Seldom have we read so touching a tale as this of a long-continued and painful search for relief from the burden of sin. Chundra Lela's father was a wealthy landowner of princely ancestry in Nepal, but she was the child of a polygamous marriage, and was left a widow at nine years of age. Through the broad-mindedness of her father she enjoyed the benefits of an education altogether unusual among girls even of her station; but at thirteen she was deprived of the care of this parent, and left to study the dark, sad story of Hinduism in the sacred books.

A year later she determined to visit the four great shrines situated at the cardinal points of India, and to do all else laid down as likely to procure pardon for the sin which had caused her widowhood. Through sorrow and suffering she pursued her weary way, until she came into contact with a woman who was enjoying Christian instruction from Miss Julia Phillips, of the American Free Baptist Mission. Buying a Bible for eight annas (8d.), she read it day and night at first, and soon loved it so that she could not hold her peace about the treasure she had found.

After two months, this earnest seeker expressed the wish to become a Christian, was baptized, and from that time consecrated life and all its powers to the spread of the Gospel among her darkened sisters. She took a path of her own; and by tact, perseverance, and Christ-likeness won her way through difficulties hitherto deemed insurmountable. This is the record of a truly apostolic life. Thank God, grace knows no distinction of race, degree, or sex. The great lesson of the book is that there is no joy on earth like that to be found in the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. No reader will rise from the perusal of its pages without feeling that he has been brought into contact with a truly holy life. To young Christians we feel sure it will prove of real service as showing how the life in Christ has been lived amid great difficulty.

Lord Kinnaird has supplied an appreciative introduction, and Mrs. R. C. Morgan has appended an informing life-sketch of the author.

Reform of Juvenile Offenders.

STEADY advance is being made in the treatment of young offenders against the law. It is not enough to take children away from evil surroundings. In the new report on reformatory and industrial schools, Mr. Legge, the Government inspector, shows how much is being done to give the boys and girls a good start in life. The young carpenters, saddlers, shoemakers, and tailors are taught not only to do their work, but to like it, and to understand the quality of the tools and materials they handle.

Three classes of children are cared for in these schools: (1) actual offenders up to sixteen; (2) those up to fourteen who may not actually have committed any offence, but whose circumstances are such that, if not removed, they are sure to join the criminal population; (3) confirmed truants from school. At the close of last year there were 5,086 boys and 664 girls under detention—a slight decrease on the previous year. In 878 cases the parents had to contribute to the maintenance of their offspring.

It is gratifying to learn that a large proportion of these children turn out well afterwards, and that there is usually little difficulty in finding places for them. If "prevention is better than cure," it needs no argument to demonstrate the importance of such work as this; nor are proofs wanting to show what a benefit accrues to the country from its systematic adoption.

Other Lands.

Soldiers' Homes in India.

IT is true, and too much stress cannot be laid upon the fact, that to the Hindu and Mahommedan mind every European is a Christian, whatever his life may be.

This being so, it is of the utmost importance that our young men in India should not be neglected. The work of years of faithful mission labour may be undone in comparatively short time by people who bear the name of what they are not. To our memory comes the frightened remark of a Spanish missionary to whom it was said, that the place he lived in would be suitable for an English colony. "Pray do not suggest such a misfortune to my work," he replied; "the worldly Englishman would yield an influence far worse than the Spaniard."

The class of young men having the greatest claim upon our sympathy are our soldiers and sailors. Considering that these men, as a lady says, "are recruited from every grade of society, and that they are herded together, perhaps thirty or forty in a room, with no possibility of privacy, and no moral restraining influence over them, it is not to be wondered at that the depraved do not improve, or that the well-disposed and respectable, in many cases, sink into lives of sin and degradation—especially in a heathen country.

"Cut off from the possibility of seeing parents and friends, and deprived of the society of good women, it would seem as if sin were made only too easy for them. The discipline of military life touches them only as to their duties as soldiers, and, with the exception of the chaplain, there is no one to win them to a sense of their responsibilities as men, towards their God, their fellow-creatures, and themselves. To meet such a need as this, I would venture to suggest that nothing can be more helpful than to introduce these men into sanctified home life."

Miss Nangle, who says this, a lady of gentle birth, and who has known in her own experience what suffering for Christ means, founded in January, 1898, a

SOLDIERS' HOME AT BANGALORE.

Previous to her coming out, she had for four years been engaged in work among soldiers at home. When her health failed, and a warmer climate became necessary, she went to India, possessed by the desire to use her feeble strength in bringing brightness and home influence, and, above all, the Gospel of Christ, to our soldiers in India.

The beginning was not without its difficulties and trials. To use Miss Nangle's own words: "It was a new departure in this part of the world, and as we (she and the lady who joined her) belonged to no society, and it was in no sense a money-making concern, our lads at first could hardly make us out; but as it dawned upon them that we had come here on purpose to mother them, and that we had their interests at heart, our members increased rapidly, and their confidence was gained."

The Soldiers' Home at Ulsoor Road, Bangalore, has the cosy and inviting appearance which, somehow, only the touch of refined women's hands can bring about. It is well supplied with magazines, books, and suitable games. In a little alcove stands the men's own piano. The lending library is well patronized; especially appreciated are biographies and travels. Gifts of such books would be welcomed at the Home. There is, of course, a dining-room and a temperance bar, where cheap meals may be had, as well as all sorts of light refreshments and cooling drinks. The Soldiers' Gospel Temperance League, with its weekly meeting, has helped many to turn away from the drink, and has proved a stepping stone to higher things. The soldiers' wives are reached by "at homes," and systematic friendly visits to their own homes.

It was a bright Gospel meeting held in a large room specially built for the purpose, at which my husband addressed a number of soldiers, fine-looking fellows who were evidently at home in the "Songs and Solos." Miss Nangle was in such a poor state of health then, that we were afraid of missing the pleasure of meeting her; but she joined us in the evening, and though only able to converse in whispers, she revealed a little of her soul to us, and of the work, its blessings, and needs.

OTHER SIMILAR HOMES.

We visited similar homes at Calcutta, under the management of Miss Clark and Mrs. Matthews; and at Wellington, near Coonoor in the Nilgheris, which is the military sanatorium for South India. The Home at the latter place, founded and superintended by Mrs. Moore, is proving far too small for the needs of the garrison. To carry out the building of larger premises help is earnestly needed.

I have just finished reading "Enlisted; or, My Story," by that blessed woman, Miss Sandes. More than once my eyes became dim with tears as I read the touching incidents of her life and work among soldiers. She and her co-workers have witnessed the soul-awakening of many a seemingly hopeless object of their prayers.

They say of the Quetta Home: "Nothing is more pathetic than to hear men say, night after night, 'I have never drunk a drop;' or, 'I have been a different man since this Home was opened;' as if they had only been waiting for a chance to be better, and eagerly seized it when it came. Oh, friends, help us speedily to give them the chance in other parts of India!"

"Again and again the soldiers in our Indian Homes say, 'This is just what a fellow needs in India, a place like this to come to, and someone to tell his troubles to.'

"While great and wise men are puzzling over the problem of our army in India, will you not help us to do a very simple thing, to plant homes in the midst of these lonely, tempted lads?

"Someone has said, 'Youth has its unspeakable longings, its deep hungers, its cravings for tenderness. In the true home these are all met; such a home is the very shadow of Christ's wing over the life, the very cleft of the rock, the very bosom of Divine love."

Contributions to any of the above-mentioned work may be forwarded through The Christian.

Indian Famine Orphans.

IN connection with the Famine Orphanage at Aligarh, N.W.P. India, Rev. E. B. Lavalette (who, in the absence of Rev. J. C. Lawson, is in charge of the work) sends interesting particulars of the efforts that are being put forth for the reception and maintenance of Famine Orphans:—The mission has about seventeen acres of land and a number of buildings mostly of sun-dried clay, with roofs of wood-frames and tiles. Eight such buildings are occupied by the orphan boys. There is also a house for the missionaries, and a church. Corn, beans, peas, cucumbers, and tomatoes are grown. The boys are employed in basket-making, gardening, cooking, masonry, carpentry, shoe-making, printing, bread-making, tending cattle, and water-drawing and carrying.

An able carpenter has been secured, and the boys have themselves built the workshop. There are some twenty boys who are tailors, and they make clothes for all the other boys.

While every effort is being made to educate the boys and teach them to earn an honest living, the chief and all-important object in view is to bring them to Christ.

It is gratifying to know that good work is being done in this direction. When some of the boys were asked to what caste they belonged, they replied, but added, 'It makes no difference to us now to what caste we belonged, for we are all Christians.' As soon as they are able to read they are given Bibles, and they spend many hours reading the Book of books. While about their work they may frequently be heard singing the Songs of Zion.

Unrest in China.

AN ANTI-MISSIONARY PROCLAMATION.

DISQUIETING news of a serious uprising at Paoc'hingfu has been received from workers of the China Inland Mission at Hunan. Ho Chin-shêng, an Assistant Commissioner of the Hunan Military Secretariat, has issued a printed inflammatory placard against all missionaries, and several hundred men have joined him.

The terms of the proclamation are calculated to incite widespread hostility, directed as they are against missionaries of all countries. After stating the position of the people of China, who for ages have been imbued with the doctrines of Confucius and Mencius, the writer asks:—"If there were actually nothing in the religions of the various countries, their churches, and chapels, and convents, to lead people to become suspicious; if there were actually nothing in them to make people exasperated at them, why is it that the literati and masses of China, from first to last, unhesitatingly act inimically against the missionary cause, and willingly sacrifice their bodies to the axe of the Imperial Government? . . .

"Furthermore, Chinese who embrace the foreign religions are all deeply-dyed villains imbued with inherent wickedness. Initially, those men in their very nature are such as cannot come within the pale of the law. But when such enter the church to put into action their wickedness, is it possible that the people of the various countries can pretend ignorance of the heartrending, unutterable scenes enacted by such ruffians? Taking this into consideration, who can say that the reasons which led to previous riots were empty charges? As a suggestion what each country should do now, it would only be necessary to quickly withdraw the churches in this country, and the hearts of us all will be happy indeed!"

The proclamation closes by pouring contempt and ridicule on missionaries who, the writer declares, labour in vain, and only pile up anger against themselves. The longer they remain, he asserts, the deeper will be the enmity, and those imbued with enmity will care nothing for death.

Immediate action has been taken by the Governor of Hunan (Yü Lien-san), who telegraphed to the missionaries:—

"Such an ignorant and reckless person as Ho Chin-shêng has to be punished, otherwise it is to be feared that ignorant people will be influenced by the man into creating disturbances. I have already removed him from the military secretariat, and ordered his arrest and conveyance to Changsha, and have sent orders post haste to the military and civil authorities throughout the province to protect the churches, and to issue proclamations warning the ignorant masses in order to prevent them from making disturbances. In addition to sending details and a copy of the obnoxious proclamation by courier post to the Grand Council, I also hereby send you news of the affair, and request you to memorialize the Throne for me."

The Protestant Press Agency has now taken centrally-situated offices at 16 and 17, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, E.C. Rev. W. Adamson, vicar of Old Ford, is the president, Rev. E. Theodore Beckett, Minister of Arthur Street Baptist Church and Protestant Mission, Frederick Street, Gray's Inn Road, hon. secretary, while Mr. A. Le Lievre attends to Press matters.

Among the Indians.—Rev. Egerton R. Young, who as a missionary in the vast north-west territory of Canada has travelled tens of thousands of miles by canoe and dog trains, tells in a contemporary the story of the carrying of the Gospel of Christ to the wandering tribes of Indians and Eskimos. The history of these dying races is largely a sad one, but through it there runs a golden thread, the narrative of the successive missions from the time of that of the Pilgrim Fathers down to those of the Society of Friends, the Moravians, and in more recent years the Wesleyans and the Presbyterians. Mr. Young says:—"Christianity has wrought a wondrous change. The terrible war whoops have been changed into Songs of Zion, and fierce and savage warriors who once gloried only in the excitements of war are now found in large numbers as honoured members of the Church of Christ and useful and respected citizens."

Anarchists in Geneva.—2.

I WAS very anxious to speak of Christ to the Anarchist D., therefore I asked God to give me courage, and went to seek him out. According to D., Christianity has done more harm than good. The ills that afflict humanity are all comprehended in economical struggle and want of money. "Evil doing is not sin, but a stimulant. Crime is necessary to gain the well-being of society." To this I replied as God suggested to me:—

"Have you read the New Testament?" I asked him. "No."

"Well, take this and read it. You will see that all is not remedied down here by money."

"I will read it, but I fear we shall never come to an understanding," he said.

I spent about two hours talking with him, during which there was a continual going and coming of Anarchists. That room, with all I had heard and seen, weighed heavily on my heart. O God, save poor D!

One of the means used by the Anarchists for their propaganda is lectures given in a public hall. There you can see from time to time 1,000 to 2,000 persons, almost all Italians and Russians. The people listen to the lecturer whilst smoking and drinking; near the door is a large table covered with Anarchist tracts. It is a sad spectacle! One feels himself, indeed, to be in the sanctuary of Satan, especially when the audience applauds because the lecturer, with words of insult, has spoken against God and the Bible. At the entrance there were two Italians, who were distributing free a blood-red colour Anarchist paper called The Priest. I accepted one, went upstairs and saluted some Anarchist leaders, and as I had my pockets full of a red Gospel tract on Christ, I began to work for Christ in that synagogue of Satan, giving as many copies as I could in all directions.

Among people animated with such a revolutionary spirit, one can easily understand the difficult nature of our work. At the Sunday evening meetings our hall is almost always full; we have a flourishing school for children, and an evening school for working men and women. We also distribute in all directions tracts and Gospels, as well as a monthly magazine, to say nothing of the visiting from house to house and at the hospital. Of course, we are strongly opposed by the Romish priests in all our efforts, but the Gospel is preached and blessed.

"Thank you, signora, for your explanations," said a woman in a loud voice, coming up to my wife at the end of the meeting, bringing her husband with her. "I could stay all night and listen," said another woman.

A working man said to me: "I have been several times to your hall. When I first came, I liked it so much that I decided to return, and now you see me always. Others have promised to accompany me, but when the time comes the friends or the bottle stand in the way; for myself, I leave everything to be present."

The annual report of the work will gladly be sent on application.

"To Get Lumber."

SOME weeks ago, under the above heading, we inserted an appeal from Rev. George Holmes, of Lesser Slave Lake, Athabasca, for help in purchasing a sawmill. Writing now, in acknowledgment of the kind and timely help of readers of The Christian, Mr. Holmes says:—"Our hearts are filled with joy and gratitude for all God's great goodness in stirring up the hearts of His people to give such a prompt and generous response. All we need now is a planing machine; and if there are any who would still like to help us in efforts to save our poor children of the woods, and place us in a position to hold our own against the aggressive movements of the agents of Rome, we shall be grateful. Without the plane we shall be unable to dress the lumber sawn by our mill. Including the freight from Edmonton, a plane will cost £100."

Mr. and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn.

VARIOUS statements having recently appeared in the daily press as to the present and intended movements of these workers, we take the opportunity of making known the facts, as laid before us by themselves.

As we stated some months ago, when they severed their connection with the Salvation Army, Mr. Booth-Clibborn joined, as a member, the movement conducted by Dr. Dowie in Chicago, making his full association with the work dependent upon Mrs. Booth-Clibborn's being able to embrace the views peculiar to that community. She was, however, unable to do so, and at the close of their visit to Chicago (where they spent the summer months), Mr. Booth-Clibborn realising that their practical usefulness would be limited by a lack of identity in their service, severed his connection with Dr. Dowie, and they have now formed a united mission for evangelistic work upon the Continent, under the name of "The Christian Mission."

In a circular about to be issued they say:—

It is entirely independent, and in connection with no church or organization. It is at the same time in sympathy with all those who are practising and preaching a pure and full Gospel, and who are fighting sin with spiritual weapons, in all places high and low, and bearing the reproach of Christ without the camp.

The conditions of membership are simply those of Evangelical Christianity, namely, the personal experience of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, through repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and living union with Him, an honest and virtuous Christian walk, and a belief in and faithfulness to the Scriptures.

Experience has shown us the paramount importance on the Continent of Europe of the spreading of the Scriptures, and the knowledge of them as the basis of all solid spiritual work, and the supreme antidote to formalism, superstition, and infidelity.

We have at present as co-workers in the field or in training twenty evangelists, all of whom have been tried in the fire, and most of whom have had at least ten years' experience in active evangelization on the Continent.

Our centres are:—Holland, 3, Damstraat, Amsterdam; France, 60, Avenue de Gennevilliers, Colombes, Paris; Belgium, 147, Rue Tenbosch, Brussels. (The last being our personal address.)

We shall now be able to answer the requests received for many years to hold some meetings in England. The first series will commence in London towards the end of January.

We look to the Lord to move the hearts of His people to help us, knowing the special obstacles to be overcome by spiritual work on the Continent, and realizing also the advantages presented by an experience gained in a united period of forty years' labour among its most widely contrasting populations.

We can scarcely have to face greater difficulties than those which God has enabled us to surmount in the past, nor greater dangers to encounter than those in the midst of which He has delivered us. Our God remains unchanged. All glory to His name. It is with confidence and assurance that we go forward in obedience to His call.

Mr. and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn have stood so long before the Christian public, highly esteemed for their works' sake, as ardent labourers for the salvation of the lost, that we cannot do otherwise than express our hope that in this new sphere they will be greatly owned of God in winning souls for His kingdom; and we commend them to God, and to the Word of His grace, that they may be Divinely guided; and that the Holy Spirit will increasingly reveal unto them His will, both as to doctrine and experimental usefulness. The world sadly needs wholly consecrated workers who count not their life dear unto them, and who are willing to stand for what they believe to be pure, and true, and of good report; and we are assured that our friends will find ample scope for such work in the dark places of the Continent, for which their long experience and knowledge of languages qualify them in a marked degree.

We ask our readers to bear them up constantly at the throne of grace, that, as they follow the Divine Word, their labours may result in the calling of many sinners out of the darkness of superstition and sin into the marvellous light of God.

In the Nile Delta.

IN this important centre of the Nile Delta we have been led to employ many means in order, if possible, to break through the walls of Moslem bigotry and fanaticism, amongst which are the following:—

Book depôt, where Scriptures are kept in Arabic, Greek, Italian, and other languages; Gospel tracts and other publications, especially for Moslems; controversial and other books; colportage and itineration through the towns, villages, and hamlets, preaching and speaking as opportunity offers; services on Sundays and week-days; literary work, writing and translating tracts; visiting the homes of native women by our Sisters; Sunday and day-school.

For a long time we have been desirous of opening a school for boys, believing that the way to the parents is often through the children. A gift of £50 was kindly sent us last summer for this purpose. In seeking to secure premises severe opposition was encountered, some bigoted people trying their utmost to prevent the opening of what they called a Protestant school. However, God was with us, and by resolute determination, and a few days of severe manual labour by all the missionaries, our school was opened.

A hundred boys was the limit both of our expectation and means, and we had provided seats, books, &c., for nearly that number; but in a few days we had registered over 170 boys. It was an interesting sight to see the fathers coming in from the villages around, bringing their sons to be enrolled in the English Mission School. The school is composed of both Copts and Moslems, about half of each, all of whom pay a small fee monthly, but not nearly sufficient to meet the expenses of rent, salaries, &c. The yearly rent of our school premises is £24. But while we require financial help, what we feel we need most of all are, more God-sent helpers, more Divine wisdom for ourselves, and more of the fulness of His Holy Spirit, so that in all our work for Him we may be taught how to seek the glory of His Name, the coming of His Kingdom, and the doing of His will.

The Gospel in France.

HAVING recently spent a time of much interest at La Rochelle, I should like to call attention to the Gospel work carried on there by Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Terrell. The Lord has given them much blessing in this labour of love for Him, so that they have now three Christian centres of work, at La Rochelle, La Pallice, and St. Eloi. Here are carried on children's classes, a mother's meeting, temperance meetings, and, most important of all, Gospel services.

Besides much other blessing given, two notorious drunkards have, it is believed, been truly converted to God, and are helping in the mission. At La Pallice, which is the port of La Rochelle, the need is great, as there is no place of worship of any description there, which seems a most astounding fact, and the people know little of God or of salvation that is in Christ Jesus. Here Gospel meetings are held every alternative Sunday, and a children's class every week, which are much appreciated.

Just at the time of my arrival at La Rochelle a room was opened on the quay, specially for work amongst the sailors. This is a thing very much needed, as La Rochelle is a considerable fishing port, and a large number of men are employed in this industry. Sad to say, there is much drinking among them, and there is no Sailors' Rest where they can spend their spare time, so the temptation is very great. The opening meeting was very encouraging, the room being well filled, and the men very much pleased. A magic-lantern was shown them, and loving words of invitation to come to Christ were said. Each time that I was present at these meetings, the interest seemed to deepen, and when the message of Christ's salvation was given, all joking ceased, and a great hush seemed to come over those present. Several have already signed the pledge, and the workers feel that a very good beginning has been made. Mr. Terrell has now opened this room as a "Café de Tempérance," and reading-room for the men. Whether it remains open depends on the contributions received for this much-needed work. Mr. Terrell's address is, 5, Rue St. Claude, La Rochelle, France.

The Spirit of Truth.*

By BISHOP WELLDON.

THE truths of Holy Scripture, as the truths of Nature, are frequently hidden; they lie beneath the surface; they are revealed only to faith and perseverance; but to patient hearts the language of our Lord sufficiently discloses the eternal truth of the the Holy Spirit's divinity.

Thus, in the valedictory address, as in the narrative of the Baptism, the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity all appear. It is the Son who speaks, and He speaks of the Spirit whom the Father should send in His name to be His witness upon earth, when He Himself should have passed into heaven. [John xii.-xvi.]

What, then, are the offices ascribed in this great valedictory address to the Holy Spirit?

They are briefly these:—

(a) To plead the cause of Christ's disciples, as the name [Paraclete] denotes; to strengthen them, to support them.

(b) To teach them all things, especially by recalling Christ's words to their memories (John xiv. 26).

(c) To testify of Christ, or, as elsewhere, to glorify Him (John xv. 26; xvi. 14).

(d) To reprove (or "convict") the world of (i.e., "in respect of") sin and of unrighteousness and of judgment (John xvi. 8).

(e) To guide the disciples into all truth, and in particular to show them (or "declare to them") the things to come (John xvi. 13), i.e., the new order and system of the Christian Church.

But when these several offices are thus enunciated side by side, it becomes immediately evident that they merge themselves into one sublime and supreme conception of the Holy Spirit, as always and everywhere inspiring, inculcating, encouraging, and establishing the Truth of which Jesus Christ is the Author and Revealer. And then it is seen why our Lord in His valedictory address makes use of one descriptive phrase, and of one only, and of this three times, to signify Him whom He calls the Paraclete, viz., "the Spirit of Truth" (John xiv. 17, xv. 26, xvi. 13); for in that one phrase is contained the office of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit, then, is "the Spirit of Truth," i.e., the Spirit whose character is Truth, whose function it is to declare and diffuse Truth in the world. And as He is the "Spirit of Truth" so is He the Spirit of Him who could say at the outset of His address, "I am . . . the Truth" (John xiv. 6). And inasmuch as He is the "Spirit of Truth," the world, the which is always represented in John's Gospel as our Lord's great enemy, is impotent to receive Him, "because it beholdeth Him not, neither knoweth Him" (John xiv. 17); for the world ever shuts its eyes against Divine Truth, and none but they whose souls are spiritually enlightened can discern His indwelling Presence.

There is no higher revelation than this, that the Holy Spirit whom the Son of God should send from the Father is "the Spirit of Truth." For it defines the relation of Christianity to truth. It charges Christians with a unique and absolute duty in the cause of truth; religion, and especially the religion of Jesus Christ, is, or ought to be, the sovereign motive to the love of truth. For not only is the God in whom Christians believe a God of truth, who cannot lie, but Christians are inspired by the doctrine of the Holy Spirit with a profound faith in the majesty and victory of truth. Nor can any sin be more heinous in Christian eyes than the sin of resisting or obscuring truth, for that is a sin against "the Spirit of Truth" Himself.

* Extract from "The Revelation of the Holy Spirit." By J. E. C. Welldon, D.D., lately Bishop of Calcutta. (6s. Macmillan.) This is a book full of thought, but it is not all so free from ecclesiastical speculation as is the passage we quote. The Bishop studies his subject in the light of the Old Testament and the New, and also in relation to the writings of the Fathers, the Councils and Creeds of the Church, and the progress of history. Though not always adopting the author's point of view, we have found much that is helpful in his substantial volume.

The Teacher and the Bible.*

By H. THISELTON MARK.

IN the midst of all literatures, only one contains within it the elements of miracle, and holds the potency of eternal growth. Solemnly and grandly built up, the Bible is the tower from which the world's purest light for ever shines. In what senses is the Bible our treasury? Individuals read the Bible very differently; hence the number of sects and religious denominations. The Bible is not a treasury of quite the same things to one and to another. There is a very real sense in which only that part of the Bible is a source of supply to us which we have "tried and proved." In this way it is possible to have a very big book, but a very small Bible. Our real source of supply is in what "our hands have handled of the word of life." The Bible shines with a manifold light. It is a lamp to men's feet along varying paths. Is not this partly what denominationalism means? Each lives by the light which the Bible sheds for him; and the world is brighter by every man's light, richer by every man's truth. And this suggests a further sense in which the Bible is the teacher's treasury.

The more we take from it, the greater it becomes. Moreover, what an enrichment of human speech we owe to the Old and New Testaments, more especially to the New. As has been said, "Christ not only converted men, He converted words." An enriched vocabulary, and one which it is worth the teacher's while to note in the actual process of change, has arisen from the new meanings Christ gave to words. It would repay most Sunday-school teachers to acquire just sufficient of the Greek language—a very little study would serve for this—to be able to turn up in the dictionary some of the striking words occurring in their lessons; to note, for example, how pagan "joy" is transfigured in Christian "joy," and the same with "peace," or "truth," or "life." A good lexicon sometimes serves as the best of commentaries, by the insight we gain from it into words.

From The Teacher and the Child. By H. Thiselton Mark, B.A. (Lond.), B.Sc. (Vict.). (1s. 6d. Fisher Unwin.) The author's works dealing with the theory and practice of education in England and America are well-known in the profession; and as Master of Method at Owens College, Manchester, he speaks with the authority of leadership as well as of long experience. The volume truly and amply bears out the promise of the title-page—"Elements of moral and religious teaching in the day-school, the home, and the Sunday-school." It is a comprehensive text-book of the subject, yet suited in every way for the use of the private student; and the parent, guardian, or instructor of youth must be well equipped indeed who has not something—probably much—to learn from these pages.

METHOD AS WELL AS MATERIAL.

But, after so many writers have inveighed against the too exclusive use of books as our source of information, it would ill become anyone addressing a body of practical workers in the field of education to allow it to appear that books, even including the Bible, constitute in themselves the whole of the teacher's treasury. One of the most valuable uses we can make of a great book is to study its method in order to see wherein its greatness lies. We shall then see that the great books are those which deal with life at first hand. Here, then, is method as well as material. How did the prophets utter their messages? Whence draw their imagery? How reach the heart? In what way are the parables model lessons? Whence is their material drawn? So we should find ourselves led to Nature, and, above all, to human nature, as great books without which all others are bereft of substance and meaning.

Patient Hopefulness.*

By Rev. DAVID WATSON.

HOPEFULNESS is a quality of youth, but not patient hopefulness. Patience is a quality of age, but not hopeful patience. The sanguine hopefulness of youth is largely due to ignorance of life and of the obstacles sure to present themselves in the path of progress. The patience and hopelessness of age are the fruit of knowledge. If we cannot impart the hopefulness of youth to disillusioned age, nor the patience of age to enthusiastic youth, we may succeed in making the hopefulness of the latter a little more patient. Christ was the true optimist, because, knowing the worst, He yet hoped the best. . . .

Let us be patiently hopeful in all our philanthropic and reform work. Let us keep an ever-open door, and an ever burning light for the returning prodigal. Depend upon it, he has suffered enough in the wilderness. Frown not upon him in his rags and distress. Beware of doing anything to increase his self-despair. Bid him hope. He may yet attain to manly virtue, tested in the school of temptation, but victorious.

Let the Christian worker be patiently hopeful. Never lose heart because of the poor results that seem to follow your labours. Keep on sowing the seed beside all waters, and leave the results with God. Growth is as mysterious as life itself. You sow your seed in the ground, and you can do no more. You can only watch and wait. How helpless you feel! But one fine morning you will see something green peeping up above the soil—something delicate and coy—it is your growing seed! It is awe-inspiring, too, this wondrous mystical thing we call growth. And surely no less wonderful, or mysterious, or beautiful, is spiritual growth—the spectacle of a soul rising in the teeth of sin and earthly bonds, and growing in spiritual beauty and power. It is worth waiting for, and makes up for a score of disappointments.

A very useful series of works on Bible study has been produced by Rev. Henry T. Sell, M.A. Two of them are before us—Bible Study by Books, and Bible Study by Periods. (1s. 6d. net each. Fleming H. Revell Co.) We commend these books very heartily, both for private work or class use. Those who have not followed strict method in Bible study will be surprised at the profit gained by adopting the former work, in which the Bible is studied book by book. The second volume marks an advance, and will also repay all the thought expended upon it. Teachers who desire to know their Bibles, will find great help in Mr. Sell's methods of study.

* From In Life's School, by Rev David Watson. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) Addressing himself "to young men everywhere with the fervent hope that they may win the prize that is best worth winning in the school which men call life," the author has kept well in view their special needs, temptations, and aspirations. Those who come into contact with thoughtful young men will find help here in the showing of the best things in life in their true relation to the spiritual. Accepting all the good that is presented in literature, art, and experience, it is shown that there is no finality short of Christ.

*Two Sides of Friendship.

By ANNIE TRUMBULL SLOSSON.

WHEN I was a girl I used to think and talk a great deal about friendship. Most young folks do, I guess. It's a kind of nice-sounding, sentimental word, and lots has been said and writ about it. . . . Well, I kept choosing friends, one at a time, and each time I'd think it was going to be one of the friendships you read about. But somehow it didn't turn out that way. Mebbe she—the friend—would give up to me and do things for me, first-off, but it wouldn't last. She'd get tired giving up, and expect me to do some of the sacrificing, and then I'd be disappointed and discouraged, and feel as if I was a kind of martyr. And I'd write compositions about this world's being a fleeting show, and how nobody appreciated folks whose hearts were crying out for a friend, and all that silly stuff young folks talk and write. . . .

'Twas just at that time when I was seeing all this, and was disappointed and discouraged for about the twentieth time in my life, that something happened. 'Twasn't anything out of the common; at least it didn't appear to be at first. I was turning over the leaves of my Bible, looking for a good verse to say at weekly prayer meeting, when my eye fell on the word "friend," and I stopped to read what it said. It was that beautiful verse, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." Well, in my narrow, selfish way of looking at the subject, poor, silly girl that I was, I says to myself, "Oh, how true that is! But where shall I ever find such a friend, one that would really and truly lay down her life for me?"

All of a sudden—for the very first time in my life, if you'll believe it—came into my mind the question, "What about your doing that for a friend?" I felt kind of ashamed, even though I was all alone by myself, but I tried to get around it by saying, "We're not talking about that side of it; that's another question." But I knew all the time it wasn't another question, but the same, only more important. I tried to get it out of my head, so I thought I'd look up some other verses about friends and friendship, thinking they might give different views. I had a little leather-covered book, "Brown's Concordance," and I began to look it over. I found a good many verses about friends, such as "A friend loveth at all times"—not only when things go right, you see; and "Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not"—not even if they're not quite perfect, and seem a mite selfish.

Turning over the pages, I kept coming upon passages about our dealings with our "brothers"—which must be about the same as friends—the forgiving them, and bearing with them, and giving up for them, and doing for them, and "by love, serving one another," bearing each other's burdens, being long-suffering. And I struck by chance (mebbe it wasn't chance) on those verses about charity; its never failing, its suffering long, its bearing all things, believing all things, hoping all things, enduring all things. Dear me, by that time I almost crawled under the table, I was so ashamed of what I had called my friendships.

But all that was nothing when I came, sudden like, upon this verse: "Henceforth, I call you not servants, but friends." It was the Lord, our Master, who said that, you know. And He said it to them that were weak and foolish and full of mistakes, if nothing worse. He said it to Peter, who was going to deny Him in the very first trouble that came; to Thomas, so full of doubtings and unbelief; to all of them that, when trials came, "forsook Him and fled." He called them friends, with all their sins and selfish ways, and was going to lay down His life for them—and He did it. I knew all this before, but somehow I hadn't thought of it in this connection, when I was trying to find out what friendship was, and why I hadn't ever got the right kind of friend.

That was one of the great waking-ups of my life, and I've had a good many. I don't mean to say I'm the right kind of friend now. I can see such self-seeking, mean, uncharitable things in my friendships always, still; but I know now what they ought to be.

* FROM AUNT ABBY'S NEIGHBOURS. By Annie Trumbull Slosson. (2s. 6d. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.) There is a subtle charm about the quaint far-seeing Americanisms with which the book abounds, a breeziness which speaks of a land where traditions as to belief or church order are held more lightly than at home. But the original of "Aunt Abby"—if one person sat for the portrait—had a firm grip of the essentials of the faith, and lived near to God. To have the veil lifted from such a life in our own experience, is to feel the breath of Heaven blowing around us. The pen that can write such descriptions is in the hand of one skilled to touch the deepest chords of the human heart, and to tune them to the music of the Better Land.

Saint and Missionary.

IN the "Books for the Heart" series, Rev. Alex. Smellie has given us some of the excellent things of spiritual literature. Among the most welcome we would include the last—THE DIARY AND JOURNAL OF DAVID BRAINERD (two volumes, 5s. Andrew Melrose). The first volume gives the Diary, in which Brainerd delineates his own innermost life; the second gives the Journal, which supplies the narrative of his missionary work among the Red Indians.

The story of the saint who is here brought before us, should not be lost sight of in these days of many books. There are few stories so ennobling in the highest sense of the word. It introduces us to the heart and life of a man who knew God and did exploits; one who had found out the secret of peace and the source of power. Mr. Smellie writes a very helpful introduction. May the blessing which came to the soul of Henry Martyn through reading this remarkable story, come to many in the present day, and prove a missionary stimulus as well as a means of grace in daily life.

A whole-hearted man, Brainerd did his life-work in a very short time. He died at the age of twenty-nine. "Being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time." The diary reveals the saint in prayer and praise, in self-examination and in childlike confidence in God. Brainerd resolved that the world should not see his diary—the pages of which were so essentially private; but just before his death, responding to earnest entreaty, he consented that Jonathan Edwards should deal with it as he might think fit for the glory of God and in the interests of religion. So here we have both diary and journal substantially as edited by President Edwards, whose preface to the original edition is also reproduced.

We warmly commend these volumes, from which an admirable picture of the man and his work may be gathered, though their real charm and beauty lie in the deep spirituality of their contents. In the words of Mr. Smellie, "We may read the inscription, 'Holiness to the Lord,' carved in the plainest letters over everything in Brainerd's history. He had no liking for conversation which did not transport him into the sacrosanct presence of his God, and which was not seasoned with the salt of the Better Country."

Wesley's Journal.

JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL needs neither description nor commendation. Those who would understand the religious and social life of Great Britain during the eighteenth century must read it; and the more they read, the deeper will be their knowledge of movements and influences that are still with us as citizens and Christians. Inasmuch, however, as the portions of the journal already published fill four substantial volumes, it may be too much to expect all thoughtful people to undertake a perusal of the wonderful book—at once a revelation of the great evangelist and a mirror of the times in which he lived and laboured. Hence an abridgement in one single volume (3s. 6d. net. Isbister) is welcome.

The condensation has been effected by Percy Livingstone Parker, and with excellent judgment. There is an Introduction by Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, and an Appreciation by Mr. Augustine Birrell, K.C. These pages will enable the busy man and such as cannot read many books to gather helpful impressions regarding the greatness and goodness of Wesley. The pictures of evangelistic work in the eighteenth century are numerous and of astonishing interest.

Poems.

By FRANCES BEVAN.

The poems of Mrs. Frances Bevan express in verse ideas appertaining to the profoundest truths. Those who treasure her other writings in prose and verse will welcome "COME," a small volume of Gospel hymns. (1s. 6d. Nisbet.)

"Come."

"Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Matt. xi. 28.

To Him Who is rest to the weary,
Who is to the hungry bread,
Is cleansing and health to the leper,
Eternal Life to the dead,
Christ calleth, "Come."

To Him Who has known thy transgressions,
Has known the revolt of thy will,
Has known thy disease, thy pollution,
And knowing thee, loves thee still,
Christ calleth, "Come."

Behold Him Whose crown thou hast woven
Of thorns of the curse and the ban,
Who now in the crown of His glory,
The risen, ascended Man,
Yearns over thee.

Behold! He has paid all the ransom
That sets thee eternally free,
And drunk to the dregs all the judgment,
The cup of the curse for thee.
All, all is done.

And now to the Home of thy Father,
And now to the heart of thy God,
To the joy that His agony measured,
To the glory won by His Blood,
Christ calleth, "Come."

REV. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

In a fascinating volume, entitled THE DISTANT LIGHTS: A Little Book of Verses, the gifted author of "A Cluster of Quiet Thoughts" and "Little Tapers" gives us another delightful collection of brief poems, all of them breathing true devotion and marked by literary finish. They are polished gems of religious thought. (1s. Religious Tract Society.) A sample follows:—

Every True Life Climbs a Pisgah.

TO A DISPIRITED WORKER.

Ah, weary of the marches and the fight!
The tears break from thee, swift and uncontrolled
Yea, weep; then rise, and make thy langour bold
To bear thee up this keen and windy height.
See! like a rapture poured upon the sight,
Of some high dreamer, all the land unrolled
Takes of the sunrise amethyst and gold,
And the vine reddens, and the corn grows bright.

Thou may'st not enter; thou shalt lay thee down
Ere hearts catch fire and splendid deeds begin.
For thee remain the idly-leaguered town,
The tangled feet that grind the stones of sin;
Yet doth God give thee His Belovèd's crown—
To fight and fail, that others enter in.

Week-Night Meditations.

IN many a Christian life the week-night service is a much-prized time of refreshing in the midst of more or less irksome business and routine duty. To those who are denied such spiritual privileges, as well as to many more, such books as THIRSTING FOR THE SPRINGS, by Rev. J. H. Jowett (3s. 6d. H. R. Allenson), are always welcome visitors. The meditations of which it is composed have the true ring of helpfulness and uplifting. No barrier of scholarship or learning is set up; plain men and women are addressed in the simplest terms by one whose words touch the heart, because they are the outcome of personal dealing with God, and of true sympathy for his fellow pilgrims.

The topics are varied, and the treatment of them characterized alike by freshness and vigour. The one aim of the preacher is to present Christ as healer of every wound, and supplier of every need. Mr. Jowett has pondered much on some of the most serious weaknesses of modern life, and is not afraid to speak frankly about them. He deplores the practical disappearance of religious awe, or fruitful fear, from many lives, and calls for a reproclamation of the elements of severity which minister to a bracing holiness. The dangers of compromise are brought out into the full light and contrasted with ubiquitous piety and sanctified scruples.

A Protest Against Ritual.*

By DEAN FARRAR.

TO argue that the Christian ministry is a sacrificial priesthood on the strength of two incidental words in St. Paul, in spite of the fact that such an interpretation makes nonsense of both passages, and that the word hiereis (sacerdotes) is not once given to Christian presbyters in the whole New Testament; to argue that the Lord's Table is an "altar" on the strength of a phrase in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which has not so been understood by any leading Christian divine from St. Ambrose to Bishop Westcott, which is repudiated even by such great Roman Catholic commentators as St. Thomas Aquinas, Rupert of Dentz, and Estius, and which makes the whole passage absolutely meaningless; to argue in favour of the use of incense in worship from a chance allusion in Malachi, though there is not the faintest reference to the use of incense for the purposes of earthly worship in the teaching of our Lord or any one of His Apostles—to wrest the Scriptures in this way, is not to use any valid argument, but to snatch at any implement, however antiquated or however blunt, which may be so flourished about as to dazzle the wholly ignorant or the half-informed.

HOW OUR LORD WORSHIPPED.

If we desire that our Christian worship in the Church of England should be real, and noble, and primitive, and in the true sense Scriptural, we must learn what are its essential elements, from the teaching of Christ Himself, and of those Apostles who knew Him most intimately, and were most plenarily inspired by His Holy Spirit. Nothing can be even important, much less essential, for the life in Christ, to which Christ Himself and His disciples never attached the most infinitesimal importance. . . . The worship in which our blessed Lord habitually took part, Sabbath after Sabbath, throughout long years of His life, was all but exclusively the worship of the Synagogue. The Jewish synagogues were bare, even to baldness; they were almost wholly devoid of any sort of decoration, and the forms of worship adopted in them were entirely free from any kind of ceremonial.

THE OBVIOUS LESSON.

If such forms of worship were approved by the Lord of our salvation; if He never disparaged, but, on the contrary, habitually frequented, the humble buildings in which they were carried on; if He never uttered a single word designed to encourage a more pompous or symbolic ritual; if those synagogues sufficed Him for the proclamation of the Word of Life; and if—as is undoubtedly the case—the Synagogue, not the Temple, furnished the early Christians with the model of their congregational worship, and the idea of their ministry—then it is idle to pretend that incense, and vestments, and genuflexions, and ablutions, and crossings, and lights, and elaborate ceremonies, and ornaments, and the veneration of images and crucifixes, are desirable—much less necessary—elements of acceptable devotion. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in truth." The only rubric in the New Testament is, "Let all things be done decently and in order."

Some of the excellent controversial pamphlets which Mr. Walter Walsh has recently given to the world, have been issued in volume form, with the title—Popular Protestant Papers. (1s. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) Among the papers are "Why we do not need the Church of Rome?" "The British Jesuits," "The Confessional in the Church of Rome," and "Romanism an Idolatrous Religion." The remaining papers deal with Rome's treatment of the dead and the Bible. All the papers bring out acts of pressing importance at the present time.

* From the preface to TRUE RELIGION, the first volume of a new series entitled "The World's Pulpit." (3s. 6d. S. C. Brown, Langham & Co.) The sermons have been mainly preached in connection with the fasts and festivals of the Church calendar; but the attention of the reader is drawn away from incidentals, and directed unmistakably to the great verities of the faith. The teaching is such as readers of Dean Farrar's works are familiar with, but the treatment of the various subjects is fresh and original. The way of salvation and the provision for progress in the Christian life are pointed out so that the simplest may understand, and the most timid may be encouraged to step forward.

The Progress of Doctrine.

THAT a series of Bampton Lectures delivered in 1864, should be issued in successive editions, and be still in demand at the beginning of the twentieth century, is a surprising thing. This distinction belongs to Canon T. H. Bernard's well-known volume, THE PROGRESS OF DOCTRINE IN THE NEW TESTAMENT,* and we doubt if there is another in the long list of Bampton Lectures to which we could give so hearty a welcome as we do to this. The book made its mark when it first saw the light; it has helped to enrich many volumes on New Testament teaching and characteristics; and its ministry will not soon be exhausted.

Those who do not know the book, may be in doubt what to understand by the title. The author makes his intention plain in some prefatorial remarks. He says:—

> The title may appear to some to announce an intention of drawing from the New Testament materials for an historical inquiry into the growth of Christian doctrine, as it took place in the minds and under the hands of the Apostles. To others it may indicate a purpose of showing that the New Testament itself exhibits a scheme of progressive doctrine, fashioned for permanent and universal use. The lectures will be found to address themselves not to the first, but to the second of these attempts; not examining the New Testament collection in order to ascertain the chronological sequence of fact, but contemplating it, as it is, for the purpose of observing the actual sequence of thought.

Along these lines Canon Bernard conducts us, and the result is a book which admirably answers to the design of the series to which it belongs; it confirms and establishes the Christian Faith, and throws important light upon the Holy Scriptures in their inspiration and authority. Whether dealing with the Gospels or the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles or the Apocalypse, Canon Bernard is a powerful teacher. Characteristics and contrasts, design and performance, in a word, the method of Divine revelation—these form the substance of his work. The book is one of those which abundantly repay study; one carries from its pages principles that are of service in one's own reading and investigations. We have more than once spoken highly of this work; and we heartily commend the reissue to Bible students and teachers.

Dogmatic Theology.†

THE late Rev. E. A. Litton, of Naunton, was held in high regard as an Evangelical theologian; and the books which he gave to the Church at large will not soon lose their value. His INTRODUCTION TO DOGMATIC THEOLOGY was a work of much research. Coming out, however, in two volumes, separated by an interval of some years, it did not secure the attention it deserved. When, at length, the intrinsic worth of the work was realized, sets could not be made up without considerable difficulty and delay.

It is a pleasure to announce the reissue of this important work in one substantial volume. Though "based on the Articles," the book does not follow their order of thought; the author's arrangement is systematic, and the history of dogma is combined with lucid statements of Scripture teaching. One does not read many pages before seeing the serious purpose of this work. Mr. Litton was a thorough Protestant, and he saw an opportunity to serve the cause of truth by exposing the errors of Rome. Hence, in his own words, he aimed to produce "a scientific comparison of the dogmatical systems of the two great divisions of western Christendom, exhibiting their fundamental doctrinal differences, rather than the popular aspect which they severally present to the world."

The order of treatment is, in brief:—The Rule of Faith; Christian Theism: (a) one God; (b) the Holy Trinity; Man before and after the Fall; the Person and Work of Christ; Order of Salvation (Individual): (a) Calling; (b) Justification; (c) Regeneration; The Communion of Saints: (a) the Church; (b) the Means of Grace. Being an independent thinker, and a man of great candour, the author does not always use the language which is sure of popular assent.

Prebendary Wace, in an Introduction on "The Study of Dogmatic Theology," says that this work "surveys more comprehensively than any English book on the subject, the general course of theology in early, mediæval, and modern times, and illustrates the principles of the various systems, whether Catholic or Protestant, which have from time to time prevailed." Being uncompromisingly Protestant in character, this is a book for our day.

Sermons and Addresses.

Originally addressed by Rev. F. J. Laverack as letters to his congregation, the chapters of Life's Asides (1s. 6d. net. A. H. Stockwell) are fitted to point a yet wider circle to the blessedness to be found in quiet paths of meditation.

A charming Christmas booklet is In Perfect Peace, by Rev. J. R. Miller, D.D. (1s. Hodder & Stoughton.) It will bring a message of comfort to those who are fighting the battle of life; and the clear Gospel teaching of Dr. Miller is effectively illustrated by numerous pictures.

The twelve addresses published under the title of the first God's Looking-Glass, by Rev. William Hay, of Ayr (2s. A. H. Stockwell), are good examples of how a large variety of topics may be used to convey spiritual truth to young people in simple yet attractive fashion. Good use is made of illustration, but it is never allowed to obscure the main issue.

From some of the less frequented by-ways of Scripture history, Rev. J. G. Greenhough has brought forth in Old Pictures in Modern Frames (1s. 6d. T. Clarke & Co.) much that is helpful and suggestive. The reader will be encouraged to follow such paths, and may thereby be led to appreciate the infinite resource of Scripture. The outstanding feature of the sermons is the indication of the Divine provision made for the needs of daily life.

If the large numbers of professing Christians, who seem to "stand all the day idle," could be induced to read prayerfully such a book as Sonship and Service (1s. 6d. C. H. Kelly), by Rev. Thomas Waugh, they would, we feel sure, experience an awakening to the sense of Christian responsibility. The sermons and lectures which formed the basis of it, were used to rouse and bless many who heard them. The book will be welcomed by young converts.

How to Live the Christian Life is a series of addresses by the late Rev. Wm. J. Patton, of Dromara, edited, with an introduction, by Rev. John M'Ilveen, B.A., of Belfast. (2s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) The subjects are: "The Indwelling of Christ," "The Fulness of the Spirit," "The Living Sacrifice," "Holy Boldness," and "Prayer in the Name of Jesus." This is a book that deserves a high place among such as aim at spiritual helpfulness; its teaching is clear, and the pages are rich in illustrative allusions gathered from a wide range of reading.

Rev. John Kelman (Leith) opens the preface to Redeeming Judgment (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier) with the declaration that the Gospel of Jesus Christ has lost none of its ancient suitableness or efficacy. He saw its power in the Revivals of 1859-60 and "the seventies," as well as in connection with his own lengthened service; and the sermons of which the volume has been composed have been selected in the hope of sending further afield the messages God gave him to deliver. Blessed to the original hearers, they are fitted to be the basis of much profitable meditation, and in the hand of the Spirit to be sources of inspiration in the Christian life.

Without committing ourselves to some of what appears to be the political economy ideals of the author, or to his views and strictures on the working classes, we commend The Gospel and Social Questions, by Rev. Ambrose Shepherd (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton), to the attention of those who share with their Lord the burden of the poor and down-trodden masses. These addresses are throughout characterized by fresh and vigorous thinking. Sin is frankly recognized as "the heart of wrong, and sorrow, and defeat"; the new birth as "the first and absolute condition of finding salvation, either for the individual or the community." Sympathy as well as interest will follow Mr. Shepherd in his effort to demonstrate in Glasgow the possibilities in the direction of social regeneration of a large "mid-town" church.

Three Preachers.

Dr. Parker.

In writing The Life of Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D. (6s. net. Cassell), Dr. William Adamson has lifted the veil from much more than a series of facts and deeds. Long and intimate personal friendship had qualified him in a peculiar degree to put in the forefront the elements and forces in Dr. Parker's character which have placed him in his present position. The writer is anxious that his friend should be known as he really is, and loved alike for his personal qualities and his work's sake. He has pictured him in a fashion that will accomplish his object in many quarters.

The broad outlines of Dr. Parker's career are well known; but, beginning with his birth nearly seventy-three years ago, they are all set down here anew in attractive fashion, with much that is fresh and deeply interesting. His connection with the City Temple has been so long and so honourable that his earlier movements are largely eclipsed. In many ways he has touched municipal, national, and Church life; and the result has ever been creditable to himself and beneficial to the community. The following are his own words about the spiritual crisis of his life:—

I remember the Sunday night when, walking with my father and a most intelligent Sunday-school teacher, I declared my love to Christ, and asked him to take my child-heart into His own gracious keeping. The whole scene is ever before me. The two men, father and teacher, explained to me what they knew of the power and grace of Christ, and by many loving words they tempted my tongue into its first audible expression of thought and feeling. It was a summer evening according to the reckoning of the calendar, but according to a higher calendar it was in very deed a Sunday morning, through whose white light and emblematic dew and stir of awakening life I saw the gates of the Kingdom and the face of the King.

Very early the future preacher was busy addressing meetings of young people, and at eighteen his power as an open-air preacher was recognised. From that day till now he has been a growing power in the land as a witness for Christ. His pulpit work is thus summed up by Dr. Adamson:—

There runs through the whole of his preaching a firm faith in the inspiration and authority of the Bible, the terrible nature and turpitude of sin, the love of God to our fallen race, the necessity of the Spirit's work in the regeneration of the soul, the supreme Divinity of Jesus Christ, the nature of His atonement, and the necessity, on the part of the sinner, of faith in Christ for salvation and a righteous life.

While fully accomplishing his proper object, Dr. Adamson has made his book informing on the religious history of England during the period he covers. Dr. Parker's vision penetrates to the under-currents of life; he was not always an optimist. Preaching last year, just after the assassination of President McKinley, he said:—

I am perfectly clear that anarchy, and all that anarchy means, is more widespread than even some statesmen suspect. You hear of it in by-places, you hear it in fragments of foreign language, you hear it in significant whispers; I hear it all over this central part of London. . . Anarchy means, in its earlier stages, dislike of discipline, especially hatred of work, love of unearned and lazy bread, spiteful discontent with daily common service. . . . Now the law is mocked, religion is neglected or abolished, Sunday is a day of recreation, religious worship is disregarded; yet with all these things we wonder anarchy is spreading. . . . We must get back to the spirit of order, of reverence, of good-will; and we can never get back but through old Gospel ways, through the power of Christ and the grace of His Cross!

An outstanding feature in Dr. Parker's character has been his tender regard for struggling Nonconformist congregations in country towns and villages. In many an obscure place he has enthused with new strength and determination those who were becoming weary in the fight.

Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler.

THE story of a hard-worked, much-travelled, man, such as Dr. T. L. Cuyler, cannot but have attractions for many readers. The book is autobiographical,* and it is far more readable than most works of its kind, Dr. Cuyler is a felicitous writer; and here he has a subject all his own. A hale and hearty man, a celebrated preacher and a voluminous author, he looks back upon a strenuous life of eighty years.

He was born at Aurora, a village on the shores of the Cayuga Lake in Western New York, and came of an ancestry which gave orators to the pulpit, and pleaders to the bar. When quite young, he lost his father by death, and thus, to use his own words, "passed entirely into the care of one of the best mothers that God ever gave to an only son." He adds: "She was more to me than school, pastor, or church, or all combined. God made mothers before He made ministers; the progress of Christ's Kingdom depends more upon the influence of faithful, wise, and pious mothers than upon any other human agency."

The religious influences that were thrown around the youth were of the good old Puritan type. Scripture was committed to memory, as also was the Westminster Catechism. So our friend of many years became the Bible scholar that he is, and learned to wield with power and effect words and phrases from the "well of English undefiled." Early years were spent in wholesome country occupations, which provided the growing lad with a stock of health which has not yet been exhausted; he has been preaching for the long period of fifty-six years without ever having spent a single Sabbath on a sick bed!

During the first quarter of the nineteenth century drunkenness was fearfully prevalent in America. Young Cuyler was living with his grandfather, who was one of the first agriculturists to banish intoxicants from his farm. A profound impression in favour of "prohibition" was made upon the youth, who at the age of ten or eleven signed the total abstinence pledge. His first address on the temperance question was delivered in the City Hall of Glasgow sixty years ago!

The course of Hannah in dedicating her son Samuel to the Lord, was followed to the letter by the widow Cuyler. In His own good time and way, God answered the prayer of faith. No date or place of conversion can be given; under his mother's potent training, and by the power of the Holy Spirit working through her agency, Dr. Cuyler "grew into a religious life." The story of college days at Princeton is racy reading; in endowments the college was, at that time, "as poor as a church mouse."

During his first visit to Britain, in 1842, Dr. Cuyler made the acquaintance of notabilities, most of whom have long since passed away. In some cases the acquaintance formed ripened into warm friendship. Many a good pen-picture is given in the Recollections of this period, also stories of men and things in England and Scotland. Hymnology has always been a favourite study with Dr. Cuyler, so he gives us a chapter on "Hymn-Writers I have known." Other attractive pages deal with Temperance Reform, Work in the Pulpit, Experience in Revivals, and Authorship. These lead us along the octogenarian worker's own experiences, for in each of these departments of service he has borne a noble part. His keen interest in the great work of Mr. D. L. Moody and Mr. Ira D. Sankey is well known.

Dr. Cuyler tells the story of the Civil War and Abraham Lincoln, and describes Pastoral Work as he loved it. He sketches friends at home and abroad, and gives us a retrospect that is redolent of human geniality and Gospel sincerity. The pages are full of light for other preachers; helpful and sunshiny to a high degree. The Lafayette Avenue Church, of which Dr. Cuyler was founder, and over which he presided for thirty years, receives fitting attention; one comes to feel an interest in the church on account of the grand old man who did so much for it. Written by a master of clear style, this is a most enjoyable book.

Rev. Urijah Thomas.

THOSE who knew the late Rev. Urijah Rees Thomas will welcome this substantial biography† compiled by a loving pen. On the occasion of his death, in the spring of last year, we outlined the story of his inspiring career. The pages of this volume furnish a delineation which is true to the terms of the inscription on the marble memorial erected on his tomb in Arno's Vale, Bristol: "Abundant in labour for the public good, and strenuous in battle for every righteous cause, his chief care was for those whose need was the sorest. With a heart wide as the sea, and rich in tender feeling, he was the friend of all friendless people; a father to the poor, a helper of the helpless, and defender of the oppressed; and on every little child his hand was laid in love and benediction." Mr. Thomas was for the long period of thirty-nine years the beloved minister of Redland Park Congregational Church, and to this day Bristol mourns his loss. Holding the views he did, he could hardly have been other than he was. In the early years of his ministry he delivered himself thus on the seriousness of life:—

It is an awful thing to live. We are disposed too often to regard death as the great event, and life as solemn chiefly because it leads to death and decides character. But we are wrong. The life we are now living, that is rolling over us so swiftly, often so sadly unemployed, and too frequently so wickedly abused, this is the solemn, grand reality. For this we are created, on this our eternity depends. Man's responsibilities as an individual are momentously great.

Here we have the enthusiastic preacher who was no cleric; and the politician who did not hesitate, when conscience impelled, to take the unpopular side on controverted questions.

This biography recalls many memories, local and general. The friend of little children, and the orator that moved large assemblies; the church administrator and the chairman of associations and unions; in a variety of parts Urijah Thomas gave full proof of the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus.

Help for Workers.

BY REV. DR. R. A. TORREY.

THE POWER OF A SURRENDERED LIFE.*

"POWER belongeth unto God," but there is one condition upon which that power is bestowed upon us. That condition is absolute surrender to Him. In Rom. vi. 13 we read: "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin; but yield yourselves unto God, as they that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God." Again, in Rom. vi. 22, we read: "Being now made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." The great secret of blessedness and power is found in these verses. "Yield yourselves unto God"—the whole secret is found in these words.

The word translated "yield" in the A.V. is rendered "present" in the R.V. It means, to put at one's disposal. "Put yourselves at God's disposal," is the thought. In other words, surrender yourselves absolutely to God, to be His property, for Him to do with you what He will, and use you as He will. That is the wisest thing anyone can do with himself. By that act he has secured all the blessedness that is possible to man, and day by day, and year by year, it will be bestowed upon him in ever-increasing measure. If anyone asks, "What is the one thing for me to do if I wish to know all that God has for me?" the answer is very simple. Surrender absolutely to God; say to Him, "Heavenly Father, henceforth I have no will of my own; Thy will be done in me, through me, by me, and regarding me, in all things. I put myself unreservedly in Thy hands; now do with me just what Thou wilt." When one does that, God, who is infinite love, and infinite wisdom, and infinite power, does the very best thing with that one. We may not see at once that it is the best thing; but it is, and sooner or later it will be seen. Sooner or later God floods the heart of him who surrenders absolutely to Him with light and joy, and fills his life with power. Absolute surrender to God is the secret of blessedness and power.

Knowledge of the truth comes with the surrender of the will. Nothing so clears the spiritual vision as surrender to the will of God. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (1 John i. 5). Surrender to Him opens our eyes to the light which He Himself is. It brings us at once into harmony with all truth. Nothing so blinds the spiritual vision as does self-will or sin. I have seen questions which bothered men for years solved in a very short time, when those men simply surrendered to God. What was dark as night before has become as light as day.

An unsurrendered will lies behind almost all the scepticism in the world. Oh! you who are filled with doubts and questions, would you have certainty instead of doubt? Yield yourselves to God. Oh! you who are floundering in the mire, would you get your feet on the solid rock? Yield yourselves to God. Oh! you who are trying to feel your way in the dark, would you see your path plain before you? Yield yourselves to God. The greatest truths, the truth of most significance for time and for eternity, cannot be learned by mere investigation and study. They cannot be reasoned out, they must be seen. The only one who can see them is the one whose eye is cleared by absolute surrender to God. "If, therefore, thine eye be single," says Jesus, "thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body should be full of darkness" (Matt. vi. 22. 23). A surrendered life and will is the secret of light and knowledge. Many a man has confided to me how he was wandering in the dark, not knowing what he believed, and not quite sure if he believed anything. To such I have put the questions: "Will you surrender your will to God? Will you give yourself up to God for Him to do what He will with you?" And not a single one who has done it but has soon said: "My doubts are gone, my uncertainities have gone, my darkness is gone. It is all light now." . . .

Many so-called Christians have just "enough religion to make them miserable." They can no longer enjoy the world, and they have not entered into the "joy of the Lord." There they stand, deprived of the "leeks, and the onions, and the garlic," of Egypt, and without the milk and honey, and the finest of the wheat, of Canaan. That is a wretched place to be in. The way out is simple, absolute surrender to God. Then your joy will be fulfilled. I have known so many who have entered into this fulness of joy. Sometimes it has been after a great struggle. They were so afraid to yield absolutely to God. So afraid to say: "O God, I put myself unreservedly into Thy hands; do with me what You please." They were afraid God would ask some hard thing—afraid God might whisper "China," "India," or "Africa," and sometimes He has. Sometimes there has been what to the world seemed great sacrifice, the giving up of cherished ambitions, the giving up of those dearly loved, the giving up of very much money, perhaps all one had. But there has been joy, joy "fulfilled," joy filled full.

DIFFICULTIES IN THE BIBLE.†

How shall we deal with the difficulties of the Bible?

First of all, honestly. Whenever you find a difficulty in the Bible, frankly acknowledge it. If you cannot give a good, square, honest explanation, do not attempt any as yet.

Second, humbly. Recognize the limitations of your own mind and knowledge, and do not imagine that there is no solution just because you have found none. There is, in all probability, a very simple solution, even when you can find no solution at all.

Third, determinedly. Make up your mind that you will find the solution if you can by any amount of study and hard thinking. The difficulties in the Bible are our heavenly Father's challenge to us to set our brains to work.

Fourth, fearlessly. Do not be frightened when you find a difficulty, no matter how unanswerable and insurmountable it appears upon first acquaintance. Thousands of men have found such before you. They were seen hundreds of years ago, and still the old Book stands. The Bible that has stood eighteen centuries of rigid examination and incessant and awful assault is not going under before your discoveries or before the discharges of modern critical popguns. These destructive critics always remind one of a man firing at a modern man-of-war with a bean-shooter, and wondering why it doesn't sink.

Fifth, patiently. Do not be discouraged because you do not solve every problem in a day. If some difficulty defies your best effort, lay it aside for a while. Very likely when you come back to it, it will have disappeared, and you will wonder how you were ever perplexed by it.

Sixth, Scripturally. If you find a difficulty in one part of the Bible, look for other Scripture to throw light upon it and dissolve it. Nothing explains Scripture like Scripture.

Seventh, prayerfully. It is simply wonderful how difficulties dissolve when one looks at them on his knees. One great reason why many modern Bible scholars have learned to be destructive critics is because they have forgotten how to pray.

Anyone can find near at hand conclusive evidence that the entrance of God's words as found in the Bible giveth light to individuals and to nations (Psa. cxix. 130). Who has not known men and women of most meagre general culture, and yet of rarest wisdom? When the solution of this mystery was sought, it was found in the fact that, though these men and women had not enjoyed the advantage of reading many books, they had pondered much the one Book. It is indisputable that there is more of the wisdom that is real and eternal in the Bible than in all the literature of the ages. The man who knows his Bible is a well-educated man, and the man who neglects the Bible is not a well-educated man, no matter what else he has studied. The one who thoroughly studies his Bible, even if he does not study any other book, will know more of real wisdom, the wisdom that counts for eternity as well as time, wisdom that this perishing world needs to know, wisdom for which countless hungry hearts are starving to-day, than the man who reads all other books and neglects the Bible. How often in the history of the world men of culture, men of science, men of philosophy, men of genius have sat at the feet of the man of one book, the Bible, and learned wisdom from him. The greatest man in the religious world to-day, the man who wields the mightiest influence, the man before whom theologians, ecclesiastics, and the metaphysicians have to give way, the man who exerts mighty influence even in educational circles, is a man utterly unversed in the wisdom of the schools, but who knows the Bible.

† From THE DIVINE ORIGIN OF THE BIBLE. (1s. 6d. Nisbet.)

Bishop Ryle's book, The Christian Leaders of England in the Eighteenth Century, has been familiar to students of modern Church history for thirty years or more. It gives deeply interesting sketches of Whitefield and Wesley, Grimshaw and Romaine, Berridge and Venn, as well as other Gospel teachers and preachers in a century that saw great changes in the religious outlook in our land. The papers deserve to be read over and over again; and concerning some of the subjects of the late Bishop's sympathetic pen it must be said that nothing in the way of biography is at present available. Mr. C. J. Thynne has brought out a new and popular edition (2s. 6d.) of this capital book, and in a preface Canon Christopher, of Oxford, rightly says that this and the companion volume, "Light from Old Times," are calculated to perform a useful ministry at the present time. We hope both books will be widely circulated. We cannot afford to forget the work of faith and labour of love of the worthies of the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries.

A Long Search for the Light.*

By Rev. H. C. TUCKER.

TWENTY years ago a negro slave living in a small village at the foot of the Organ mountains, which overlook the city of Rio de Janeiro, was sent to clean away the trash that had accumulated under a shed adjoining the house. There was a barrel filled with old papers, which he was ordered to empty, and as he was throwing them out, he discovered an old book; opening it, he saw the name of Jesus Christ, and concluded that it must be a good book. The title page reads: "O Novo Testamento, isto é o Novo Concerto de Nosso Fiel Senhor e Redemptor, Jesu Christo." He hid the book under his coat until the day's work was done. He was a devout Roman Catholic, and had learned to read for the purpose of reading the prayers of the church. At night he sat down by a dim light in his cabin, and there he remained the whole night reading that wonderful book. No sleep came to his eyes, but, as he told me many times, tears flowed down his cheeks, though he could not tell why. Night after night he would read, and many times the reading would make him weep. This was kept up for seventeen years. He kept the book with great care and reverence, and would never allow anything to be placed on top of the box where he kept it; he regarded it as a thing so holy that he would never allow the dust to collect on the box. He had images and saints, but this book soon became to him more sacred and holy than they. For seventeen years he kept wondering day by day what was the real meaning of all the wonderful things he was reading from that book.

A few years ago he happened to be in a small village near the Bay of Rio, where he met a black woman who was a member of one of the Protestant churches at Rio. As soon as she knew that he had read the New Testament, she began talking with him about it. He asked many questions, and she gave answers and explanations. He says that in this conversation, as with Saul of Tarsus, the scales fell from his eyes, the love of God filled his soul, and he then and there found a peace and joy for which he had been longing seventeen years.

CONVERSION THROUGH READING.

Shortly thereafter he returned to his cabin in the mountains, and for two years saw no one of this faith. A year ago one of the colporteurs of the American Bible Society, passing through that section for the first time, chanced to meet him; from that colporteur he received some instruction and bought a Bible.

While conducting a little service in the dining-room of a hotel at a village in the mountains, my attention was attracted by the intelligent interest and hearty appreciation manifested by an old black man who sat near me. After the service I had a conversation with him, and he related to me the story I have told. I shall never forget the joy and brightness expressed by that black face. It was marvellous to hear him tell the story of that Testament and of his conversion. He had obtained a wonderful knowledge of the Word of God just from reading that book. The next morning, as I was leaving the hotel, he made me a present of his precious treasure, saying that since he bought the Bible with larger print, he did not need the Testament, and as it might be of service to me he would give it up for the good of the cause.

This Testament was printed at Chelsea, England, 1817, by Tilling & ——nes (the first part of the second name has been destroyed by some means). The name, H. Hayne, is the first on the flyleaf, then comes that of Manoel Florianno de Souza. The name of the old man who gave it me is Francisco Manoel Lago. I have seen it recorded somewhere that from 1820 to 1836 a few copies of the Scriptures in Portuguese were sent from England to English merchants residing in Rio, and by them were given to people coming in from the country. I have found an occasional copy of these early consignments still in existence; some of them have wrought wonderful results, and I think it quite probable that the Testament now in question may have found its way to Brazil at that early date, perhaps eighty years ago.

* From The Bible in Brazil, Colporteur Experiences by Rev. Hugh C. Tucker, Agent of the American Bible Society (3s. 6d. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.). The volume comprises observations extending over a period of fourteen years. It is a deeply instructive and interesting account of what the Church of Christ is doing to save the seventeen millions of souls in the country, and of the real progress the work is making. Keeping the one great aim in view, much valuable information is also given regarding the people, as well as the condition, resources, and possibilities of the country. The chapters abound with incidents and statements fitted to call forth praise and thanksgiving to God.

Demonic Possession.

THE subject of demoniacal possession appeals to the curious interest of many; but merely to satisfy such interest would not justify the amount of study devoted to the theme during recent years. Our estimate of Christ and our understanding of His public ministry will in a measure receive colour from the views we entertain on the subject specified; so investigations conducted with care and reverence should yield something for faith and religious intelligence. Hence we are glad to notice the very thorough work just issued by Dr. Wm. Menzies Alexander—Demonic Possession in the New Testament.* The author is a scholar of high qualifications—medical as well as theological; and he is careful in the setting forth of facts, as well as judicious in dealing with them in argument.

The methodical treatment makes the book easy to read. Perhaps the style is more confident than some readers will approve; but the author has made up his mind, and that fact cannot be hid. He distinguishes between apparent and real possession. His judgment regarding modern cases is that they cannot be classed as genuine; here many will hesitate to follow him. In brief, our author comes to this conclusion: "Genuine demonic possession was a unique phenomenon in the history of the world; being confined, indeed, to the earlier portion of the ministry of our Lord." As having some bearing upon the demonic activity of the time, he quotes Rev. xii. 12: "Satan is come down to you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." Peculiar significance attaches to these words of Dr. Alexander: "The incarnation initiated the establishment of the kingdom of heaven upon earth. That determined a counter-movement among the powers of darkness. Genuine demonic possession was one of its manifestations."

The book is a weighty contribution to an inquiry of large importance.

A Handy Bible.

WHILE we love our Bibles for their God-given contents, we select the copy which becomes our daily companion and help on grounds of a very practical nature. Is the type clear, the paper good, the binding substantial? This is the threefold question of the man or woman who goes forth in Christian work with the Word of God in hand. And it is a question which sometimes engages considerable experiment before it is satisfactorily answered. Which of us has not tried the thick and the thin, the large and the small, before coming upon the ideal book, which we adopt "for better, for worse," for home and church use?

It is with much pleasure in this connection that we call the attention of our readers to an edition of the Holy Scriptures deserving of special consideration. It is known as the Oxford Emerald 16mo.; printed at the Oxford University Press, from large face emerald type, and of the convenient size known as 16mo., this is a book combining a very attractive page with the utmost portability as to weight and dimensions. The central reference column and selection of maps make this an admirable book for teachers; when printed on the well-known thin India paper, it is only five-eighths of an inch in thickness. Surely this is a triumph of well-directed endeavours to supply essential needs in the most convenient manner. Prospectuses, with price list, from Messrs. Morgan & Scott.

"Caught Up."

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER.

THE rapture of Elijah is one of the most significant facts in Old Testament history. Life and immortality were not fully brought to light until Christ came. The Jews were chiefly taken up with temporal blessings. The land of Canaan was, so to speak, their heaven. They had only a dim and shadowy belief in the life of the world to come. To them the reign of death seemed universal; the veil that hides the unseen world seemed thick and inpenetrable. But they were not left without witness to the reality of the life eternal. Enoch and Elijah were both taken up into heaven without dying. These two exceptions to the reign of death, this lifting of the veil to men in the fulness of physical health and vigour, must have done much to educate their faith into some apprehension of heavenly things. . . .

The Bible witnesses not to the immortality of souls, but to the resurrection of the body—the final indestructibility of man as he is, i.e., soul and body as God made him. Enoch and Elijah went to heaven as living men. Heaven is not a mere condition—it is a place as well. It is not far away, but very near; for the Lord is in heaven, and the Lord is at hand. Heaven is just the other side of the veil of sense. Hitherto only two have passed the veil without suffering death; but this is enough to show that the life beyond the veil is at least as real as the life here on earth.

Elijah was called away in the midst of an ordinary conversation. He was walking with Elisha, and talking with him about the things of God. Heaven is always near when Christians commune together, for God waits to listen, and an angel records it in a book. But this conversation was suddenly interrupted, for "as they still went on and talked, there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder"; for, "one was taken and the other was left." Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven; Elisha returned to Jericho. . . .

Now Elijah's ascension is a type of the future rapture of the saints. Many are as sceptical concerning this as the sons of the prophets were as to the translation of Elijah. Some, indeed, almost scoff at the revealed truth, it seems to them so incredible. And yet St. Paul declares it with absolute certainty. It is no matter of human conjecture—he declares it "by the word of the Lord," and sketches out the whole programme of events as one who is familiar with every detail.

* From Elijah: The Man of Prayer (1s. Morgan & Scott). Several of the earlier chapters of this book have already appeared in our columns, and have been read with much appreciation. Mr. Webster has pictured for us vividly the great messenger of God, whose name appears more often in the New Testament than even that of Isaiah. The character of him who was himself the prophet of vision grows more clear before our eyes as chapter by chapter emphasis is laid on the true secrets of his power and consecration. The teacher who is dealing with the life of Elijah will find here not only material for lessons, but guidance for the application of spiritual truth

Two Missionary Books.

Night and Morning in Dark Africa, by Harry Johnson, is a book on the people of South Tanganyika, and the work of the missionaries among them. It has been written by an L.M.S. missionary from personal knowledge and observation, and gives a very readable account of the tribes and their ways, also of life in Central Africa. There are seventy illustrations, and the book deserves many readers. (2s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.)

The nineteenth century saw few triumphs of the Gospel which equalled that among the Karens of Burmah. Those who are seeking to enlist the sympathies of young people in missionary service will welcome Soo Thah (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier), by Alonzo Bunker, D.D. In the form of a true story—although for the sake of introducing a few additional facts the name of the title character is slightly altered—the wonderful transformation effected by the introduction of the Gospel is vividly pictured. The repertoire of the missionary speaker will be enriched by the book; and we feel sure it will be a favourite in Christian households wherever it goes. In an introductory chapter, Dr. Henry C. Mabie pays a high tribute to Britain as "the one colonising Government of Europe which has given fair play to Christian Missions."

Annual Volumes.

Sunday is an old friend, and it is a great favourite in many a home. The new volume is as good as its predecessors. The pictures are numerous as well as entertaining, and the readings are brief, and such as children love. (3s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

As usual, Home Words is an interesting treasury of good things. Its variety of Sabbath reading and wealth of illustration will secure for it a place in the hearts and homes of the people. The contents comprise selections from the works of eminent Christian teachers and leaders, including the Bishops of Durham and Ripon, Rev. F. W. Orde Ward, &c. (2s. "Home Words" Office.)

There is much to interest the special constituency to which it appeals in The Girls' Empire (5s.). Stories, serial and short, naturally occupy a prominent place; but we find also helpful articles on a variety of topics. Hints on the management of suitable pets will be as welcome to some, as the Cosy Corner Chats will be to others. Reminiscences of girlhood, by Annie E. Holdsworth and Evelyn Everett-Green, have a special interest. Hints on health take a most practical form. The poetry is good, and the illustrations add much to the attractions of a volume which has many other claims to favourable notice. Tales of school and other boyish life combine with narratives of travel and adventure, and many other features, to make Boys of the Empire (7s. 6d.) such a volume as will be popular wherever healthy, active boys are to be found. The idea underlying the "Champions of the Week" is excellent, and puts the readers into touch with those who are at the head of their professions or occupations. By the introduction of "Empire Jottings" many important facts are taught in a way likely to be remembered. The B.E.L. Chaplain, by means of his notes, recalls the mind of the reader to serious matters; while the League Club creates and fosters a living bond of union between the readers who desire it. Lessons in book-keeping and shorthand will be useful, and lift the volume out of the region of mere entertainment. (Melrose.)

New features have been more numerous than usual in Messrs. Isbister's magazines during the year. As a result the volumes are brightened by a variety of popular contributions, freely illustrated, which will appeal to readers of all ages. In the Sunday Magazine a special index of portraits shows to what a great extent the lives of dead and living leaders are touched on in one fashion or other. In the longest serial story, "The Course of Justice," by Rev. Victor L. Whitchurch, the interest is well sustained and the incidents entertaining. Missionary matters are dealt with in a way that will arouse new interest in the progress of the Kingdom of God. Social and benevolent work at home is equally well represented. Food for hours of meditation is liberally provided, and the poetry which abounds is of a high order. Literary, historical, and scientific papers, of the same excellence as in previous years, are well to the front in Good Words, and those who are familiar with the work of such writers as Dr. Hugh Macmillan will turn with avidity to these pages. Amy le Feuvre's "Daughter of the Sea" is a good story of family life under difficult circumstances, with many characters who will make friends for themselves whenever they become known. The luminous articles by the Bishop of Ripon, on "The Wisdom of James the Just," will be found to open up the Epistle so that the simplest may understand and apply the teaching to daily life. Messrs. F. T. Bullen, F. D. How, William Canton, and W. G. Collingwood, and a host of other writers of prose and poetry have helped to produce a capital volume, to which ample justice has also been done in the way of illustration.

Religious Tract Society.

For the young there are Our Little Dots, and The Child's Companion (1s. each), both of them worthy of the high reputation they enjoy. Their introduction to the nursery will be as the breaking in of sunshine.

Light in the Home (1s.) carries as a second title, "Tract Magazine"; and it fully bears out the description. The little volume will win its own way when introduced among the careless. Such seed wisely and prayerfully sown will bring forth a harvest to the glory of God. In past years many a village library and reading circle has been enriched by the addition of The Cottager and Artizan. (1s. 6d.) The contents of the volume before us will appeal in turn to old and young, and comprise useful information for the home and workshop, capital stories and earnest talks full of striking points. Brevity, pithiness, and general attractiveness, appear to be the tests applied in the selection of readings, stories, and poems for Friendly Greetings. (2s. 6d.) The Gospel is presented on every page. For use among the simple and unlearned, the volume carries with it the guarantee of hearty welcome and of usefulness.

A new generation has succeeded that which first welcomed The Sunday at Home, and it is a favourite still. The effort to provide for the different members of a household has been uniformly successful. The present volume affords a new proof that the editors still keep abreast of the interests of the time. The serial stories—"Under Calvin's Spell," by D. Alcock; "David and Jonathan," by J. Shaw Crompton—maintain the traditions of former years; and are accompanied by numerous short stories for old and young. The most outstanding feature is perhaps the biographical department, which contains a number of papers of unusual interest. Among the illustrations the long series of Picturesque and Historic Churches will arrest general attention. The field covered by The Leisure Hour is very wide indeed. The Science and Over-Sea Notes, as well as the Varieties, raise many interesting and out-of-the-way points. Stories, serial and short, are up to the former high standard; and the poetry will be found well worthy of attention. A special feature is introduced under the title, "Women's Interests," and altogether feminine claims are well remembered. Popular science papers and descriptive sketches facilitate a continual change of topics; and indeed the volume as a whole is well fitted to supply the place in our general reading indicated by its title. This magazine deserves the warm place it has earned in the affections of the community. (7s. 6d. each.)

The Boy's Own Annual varies with every year; but the high healthy tone is at least maintained, and the great resources of the conductors enable them to provide constant and pleasant surprises for their exacting constituency. Such tales as "The Story of a Scout" and "The Shell-Hunters" will always find enthusiastic readers; and it must be a source of deep satisfaction to thoughtful parents to be aware of unquestionable sources of supply for such entertainment of their families. A strong feature is the series of papers dealing with the care of pet animals and birds. Numerous adventures are recounted in a manner informing as well as amusing. No pains have been spared to provide for and guide the activities of the youthful mind along desirable channels. Many-sidedness must be a mark of those who read all the contents of the Girl's Own Annual. A helpful effort is made to inspire and guide in proper directions the rightful ambitions of girls, while other articles deal with suitable employments. Music study and papers on dress have each a prominent place. Medical and legal hints are certainly useful, and may be pondered with profit; while "Studies in Character" should lead to not a little serious reflection. Paragraphs full of advice on household, culinary, needlework, gardening, and many other things, abound, and will be highly appreciated by the "sensible girls" who are addressed. The stories, long and short, are as numerous and entertaining as ever. You cannot open this book without finding something interesting. (8s. each.)

Biography.

Aidan: The Apostle of England, by Alfred C. Fryer, Ph.D., F.S.A. (1s. Partridge.) In view of the many misconceptions that prevail regarding the original evangelization of our land, we welcome such a little book as this, which outlines the progress made before ever Augustine's Roman missionaries arrived in Kent.

In A Hero of Donegal, Frederick Douglas How gives us the story of Dr. William Smyth, a man of noble deeds performed in circumstances of great difficulty in North-West Ireland, but who just a year ago succumbed to typhus fever, having contracted the disease in the course of his devoted attendance on the poor. (2s. Isbister.)

George H. C. Macgregor, M.A.: A Biography. By Rev. Duncan Campbell Macgregor, M.A., Wimbledon. (Popular edition, 3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) We heartily bespeak a large circle of readers for this cheap reissue of a splendid life story. There is much light and leading to come from the pages, and we trust that many preachers and teachers will have the book brought under their notice.

The story of the life of William Quarrier, the Orphan's Friend, has been told by Mr. John Climie in a form suitable for wide circulation. Here we have true Christian insight and sympathy combined with skilful description and a keen sense of proportion. Readers will not only understand what has been done for Scottish children, but feel as if they had added Mr. Quarrier to their personal friends. The book will have a high value among the young as an inspiration to Christian ideals rather than those of the world. (1s. net. Pickering & Inglis, Glasgow.)

A biography of special interest for its bearing upon religious life in Wales is: Life and Times of Griffith Jones, sometime rector of Llanddowror. It has been written by Rev. David Jones, B.A., vicar of Penmaenmawr, and is a contribution toward the history of the Principality during the eighteenth century. The remarkable subject of the book stands out for admiration, and his life-work suggests many a lesson for our day. The pages cast welcome sidelights upon the Welsh and their ways during the century; and what is said of the famous "circulating schools," as well the references to revival times, will command the close attention of thoughtful readers. (5s. S.P.C.K.)

Story Books.

Evelyn Everett-Green's practised pen gives The Boys of Red House to the "Good Purpose Series." (1s.) The book is a vivid picture of schoolboy pranks and adventures, sins and repentings, albeit the latter are expressed in terms which appear somewhat too "slangy." (Melrose.)

Letty's Romantic Secret, by M. E. Bewsher (3s. 6d.) is a tale illustrating the ups and downs of life, and ending with a good moral. In reading He Died For Me, by Rev. Arthur le Feuvre (5s.) we felt that we had made the acquaintance of a most lovable set of Christian schoolboys; and that we understood as never before the lot of the Indian coolies working on tea and coffee plantations (Elliot Stock).

A False Vicar, by Katherine A. Richards, is a well-timed work. Its aim is to set forth some of the insidious methods adopted by those clergy of the Anglican communion whose faces are towards the Vatican, and whose endeavours are concentrated in turning in the same direction the benevolence of their patrons. The author shows herself to be well-informed on the subject on which she writes, and the book should secure wide acceptance. (1s. 6d. Nisbet.)

Seldom has "braid scots" been used more effectively for spiritual purposes than by Mr. John Climie in What Bamboozled Her. The life of a mining village is laid bare by one to whom it is all familiar; and the reader is shown how the way of salvation was brought home to people in their own quaint, yet highly expressive and strongly-marked Saxon dialect, when the same truths expressed in pure English, though quite intelligible, would have made much less of a personal appeal. The book deserves a warm welcome at the hands of those who are inquiring how to reach the people of country districts with the Gospel, as well as of those who wish to see the dialect of South-west Scotland written by a well-qualified native. (1s. net. Pickering & Inglis.)

No. XVII. of the "Popular Stories" series is an excellent narrative, by L. St. Clare—Asked of God. The author has succeeded in illustrating, on the one hand, the frail foundation of domestic life when no allegiance to a Higher Power is recognised in the home, and, on the other, how consecration to Christ sanctifies all human love and duty. (1s.) Lanarkshire and the shores of the Firth of Clyde are made the scenes of the working out of a pleasant story in John Carville, Artist and Ironmaster, by Joseph Ritson. (3s. 6d.) The writer has a keen eye for the way in which the meshes of the net of sin are spread to trap the unwary. (A. H. Stockwell.)

(Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

The Cape Cousins, by E. M. Green, is an illustrated story for the young. The pages give pleasing glimpses of life in South Africa. (2s.)

A story of the adventures of some young people in their endeavours to "get people to church," and otherwise toil as "public benefactors" is The Bertrams of Ladywell, a book which will doubtless serve both to entertain and instruct. It is well and copiously illustrated. (2s.)

Bob Layton's Adventures were of an exciting and sensational character. What with rescuing a child from the clutches of a lion escaped from a menagerie, the capture of a horse thief, and an eventful period of service as a volunteer, the hero has a lively time of it. Transparent honesty is a feature of his strong character. (1s.)

Sunday School Union.

Many little people will find both interest and amusement in The Little Brown House, a capital story, which is the latest addition to the popular "Red Nursery" series. The book is well illustrated. (1s.)

It must be admitted that it is in some respects an ideal C.E. Society whose affairs form the theme of In the Day of His Power, by Florence Witts (1s.); but it is an interesting story, and contains many a hint for the fuller and better service of the King.

A truthful and sympathetic setting forth of ups and downs in the domestic experiences of a country minister and his family, is found in The Sisters of Trenton Manse. The unaffected, simple life depicted has many lessons which may well be taken to heart by our elder girls. The narrative is seriously earnest without being gloomy. (1s. 6d.)

Religious Tract Society.

The heroine of Little Maid Marigold is a bright little lady, whose career will interest girl readers in particular. The story gives a capital picture of boarding-school life. (2s.)

A Christian girl's daily struggles amid difficult and depressing surroundings are depicted with some force and descriptive ability by B. E. Slade in Aneal's Motto, a dramatic story with the familiar conclusion of a happy double marriage. (1s. 6d.)

"Through Suffering to God" might be the sub-title of Eglanton Thorne's taking volume, The Blessedness of Irene Farquhar. Irene is a stately society damsel, whose ambitions become purified in affliction, and her influence a gracious one. The book is both wholesome and entertaining. (2s. 6d.)

Alwyn Ravendale, by Evelyn Everett-Green (3s. 6d.), is after the manner of the author's best writing. The plot is animated, but the instruction given by the way is more to our mind. Miss Everett-Green is a powerful preacher of the Gospel, and in these pages she "stirs up her gift" to excellent purpose.

Within Sea Walls, or How the Dutch Kept the Faith (2s. 6d.), by Elizabeth H. Walsh and G. E. Sargent, is an old friend in a new form. The story of inquisition horrors in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century, under Philip II. of Spain, cannot be told without a portrayal of the heroism and devotion of Christians who were "faithful unto death." Here comes in the beauty and value of this book, which is emphatically one to place in the way of young people in the present day.

The tales of adventure which form the chapters in Once Upon a Time (2s.) have been for the most part collected from old volumes of "The Leisure Hour;" and are presented as mainly "written by those who had passed through, witnessed, and taken an active share in the events." They comprise narratives of pluck and daring, as displayed, by sea and land, in many parts of the world. The volume deserves the special attention of those in search of gift books composed of actual fact rather than fiction, which shall yet appeal as vividly to youthful tastes.

Under Calvin's Spell, by D. Alcock (3s. 6d.), is deserving of high commendation. For years past Miss Alcock has been enriching our literature with stories calculated to instruct the young in the truths of the Reformation. Spain and France, Bohemia and Holland have engaged her imagination; now she writes of Switzerland in the days of Master John Calvin. The condition of things on the Continent in general is of course indicated in the course of the story, the romantic elements of which are ennobling as well as entertaining. This is a capital book, and admirably illustrated.

In days when there is cause to fear a cooling of zeal for the Evangelical faith, it is of the highest importance that the rising generation should not be allowed to forget such facts of history as those which gather round the Scottish Solemn League and Covenant. In the story For Crown and Covenant (3s. 6d.), by Cyril Grey, a highly successful attempt is made to lift the veil from days when men so truly "loved not their lives even unto death." Such names as Renwick and Cargill are to be met with in the pages; and the book is likely to be found useful by those who are anxious to arouse the young to the maintenance of religious liberty. Strong emphasis is laid on the influence of the witness-bearing on persons who had before been careless.

Hodder & Stoughton.

Attractively bound and well illustrated, the uniform series of Annie S. Swan's stories well deserves to extend the already large body of her readers. New volumes are Good Out of Evil, Stephen Glyn, and The False and the True. (2s. 6d. each.)

Many a dark tale survives round the British coast of the days when the honest gains of the fishermen were added to by the wreckage washed ashore after a storm. A lurid light is shed on this phase of life in A Daughter of the Sea (6s.), by Amy le Feuvre. The story tells, however, also of a work of grace even in the hearts of men who previously had either lured ships on to the rocks, or after they were there allowed men and women to perish whom it was within their power to save. The dawn of affection to her husband, as well as of love to God, on the part of the central figure, will be found pourtrayed in striking and original fashion. Several deep truths are driven home with power and skill; there are few to whom the lesson in the necessity for submission will not appeal in some degree. The book claims high rank among the author's writings.

Personal portraiture is the strong point of A Whaleman's Wife, by Frank T. Bullen (6s.). Once more a thoroughly successful attempt has been made to place the lot of the seaman before the public in a fashion that will enlist sympathy as well as excite interest. Mr. Bullen has eyes for that which is pure and true and good among the lowly, and finds that troubles and difficulties are not necessarily preventives or hindrances to the growth of the higher nature. He believes in the Anglo-Saxon as opposed to the other races, which are so mixed up on shipboard. The reader realizes the tremendous test to which a Christian man is put when shut up, for years it may be, among those who have a positive genius for wickedness, and within the narrow limits of a sailing vessel. Good and evil stand out in these pages, not only in bold relief, but in striking contrast; and few will rise from their perusal without feeling that in Reuben Eddy (as in some of Mr. Bullen's previous characters) they have had a glimpse of what is meant by overcoming evil with good.

The lesson that life may be saved from being commonplace, by the spirit in which it is lived, is an important one to learn; and few experiences have so deep an interest as the lifting of the veil from similar thoughts and doings that we may see the undercurrent of pathos, it may be of tragedy, which is never far away. Those who have already been taken underneath the surface of Scottish life by David Lyall will welcome the new series of idylls in The Bells of Portknockie. (6s.) The men and women of whom we read are our true brothers and sisters; and we are helped to see, as in a looking-glass, the proportions and perspective of merits and demerits otherwise difficult to appreciate. They are provincial in the best sense, which is to say that they are true to life; but these seventeen stories touch the tenderest chords of the heart, which knows no territorial distinctions. Bringing into view, from fresh and ever-changing points, the longings and feelings we have in common, they make our hearts beat faster in sympathy with joys and sorrows closely allied to our own.

Thomas Nelson & Sons.

In Three Scottish Heroines we have stories of prowess and daring from the seventeenth century. The incidents of an eventful chapter of history are represented with many touches of realism. Girls will gain instruction and entertainment from a perusal of the doings of their brave sisters over the border. (1s. 6d.)

Few readers of A Happy Failure, by Ethel Dawson, will be inclined to lay the book aside before the last page has been reached. The members of a well-to-do family are suddenly deprived of their father, and thrown upon their own resources. With little hesitation a seaside boarding-house is taken, and the three daughters instal themselves as maids. The "failure" comes when the scheme breaks down, with of course happy results. (1s. 6d.)

In A Little Cockney, a bright and chatty story for young people, incidents and experiences of family life in both town and country are deftly interwoven. Interest, quickly secured, is held to the end. In spite of the title, no fear need be entertained of meeting with the gibberish commonly called "cockney dialect." (2s.)

Though described as "a story for girls," Two Little Travellers (2s. 6d.), by Ray Cunningham, will have an equal charm for their little brothers. The adventures of a boy and girl are charmingly told, in a way that will win for them many friends of their own years.

Stanhope, by E. L. Haverfield, is a cleverly written story of moving incident and the clash of arms in the days of Charles I. Tenderer topics are cleverly introduced, and there is some striking characterization of Puritans and Cavaliers. (3s. 6d.)

The doings of Sale's Sharpshooters are told by Harold Avery in an entertaining and absorbing manner. Mild adventures and stirring incidents abound, to the delight of youthful readers. The writer is to be congratulated on having produced so lively and natural a picture of the pranks of schoolboys. (3s. 6d.)

Fallen Fortunes, by E. Everett-Green (3s. 6d.) narrates the adventures of a gentlewoman of quality in the days of Queen Anne. The imaginative faculty of the author finds ample play in the story, which is replete with adventure and intrigue, and pleasant to read with its alternation of disappointment and triumph in the social sphere.

At the Point of the Sword sounds fierce—sanguinary, in fact. As it is from the pen of Herbert Hayens, its martial character "goes without saying." The pages tell the story of Peru and its assertion of independence; and the author makes excellent use of stirring historical incidents. (5s.)

The days when Charles I. quarrelled with his Parliament are lived over again in the pages of The Last of the Cliffords (5s.), by Eliza F. Pollard. The side-lights on the life and manners of the period are deeply interesting. As the veil is lifted from the difficulties and motives of the characters, another proof is afforded that human nature has not materially changed, although its surroundings have. It is made plain that the choice of parties was often no simple matter; and that it resulted in some instances in such painful positions as husband and wife finding their sympathies ranged on the opposing sides. Such names as those of the King, Prince Rupert, and John Hampden occur in the pages; and it must be a happy and profitable experience for young people to find the men who have stepped out of their historical lesson-books presented with all the warmth and charm of very desirable friends.

The historical tale is well represented by A Hero of the Highlands (5s.), by E. Everett-Green. Highland clans and their chiefs are graphically described from the point of view of a Derbyshire Jacobite, who is represented as living in close and personal contact with the Young Pretender from before the unfurling of his standard in Glenfinnan to the dark day on Culloden Moor. Memories of "the forty-five" have power yet to stir many besides Scottish hearts, and the author gives us glimpses of some of the undercurrents which make the more formal historical records luminous instead of obscure. With the skill of the true raconteur, many historical characters are introduced. The impossibility of the rising ever having accomplished its object is indicated in the divisions and fierce jealousies among leaders and followers alike. The picture of Prince Charlie is kindly drawn; yet it makes us thank God the more for the establishment on the throne of a Protestant dynasty. A touching sidelight is the shock with which the Prince learned how many families, still true in theory to the Stuart allegiance, had been tried beyond endurance by the weakness of James II. and his son.

S. W. Partridge & Co.

The thrilling and perilous experiences of a shipwrecked crew are related by F. M. Holmes in The Tramp Ship's Fate. The illustrations by J. B. Greene are well worthy of so stirring and wholesome a romance of the sea, and the "get up" of the book is particularly attractive. (2s.)

Rev. J. M. Dryerre's story, The Last Earl Grahame, deals with the follies of fashion, and, more particularly, with gambling and its votaries. In touching on the seamy side of society life, Mr. Dryerre exercises a wise restraint. (2s.)

One of the Tenth, a tale of the Royal Hussars, by William Johnston, takes us back thirty years, and the scene is laid in Afghanistan. The tale is one of love as well as war. (2s. 6d.)

The fact that sin brings forth its own harvest is vividly exemplified in Gold or Dross, by John W. Kneeshaw (2s. 6d.); but the deeper and fuller lesson is also taught that there is a way of escape for even the greatest sinner who will truly turn his back on his evil ways. The story is a deeply-interesting one, which will point young readers to a nobler ideal.

That the way of transgressors cannot be smooth, receives constant exemplification in our daily experiences; but that there is hope, however, in every case, is well brought out in The Parting of the Ways, by J. L. Hornibrook (3s. 6d.). The pictures of home life and of Christian service are true and beautiful, bringing the reader ever back to the fact that the best things in life are to be found in a simple walking in the ways of God.

There is a bright, breezy tone about Those Berkeley Girls, by Lillias Campbell Davidson (3s. 6d.), which should raise the spirits of any despondent reader. The story of two sisters is cleverly used to show that the pathway in which God will bless us is very often that of duty. Health, wealth, and happiness are critically examined in the light of Christian experience; and the result is a book with a sound and practical lesson, such as parents and guardians are anxious to inculcate.

The tale of old Liverpool told in Cap'n Nat's Treasure, by Robert Leighton (5s.), carries us back to 1776, when the American War of Independence had completely paralysed the trade of the city. It is a stirring tale of seaport life, in which right and wrong are shown in their true colours. A startling sidelight is that which reveals the practice of keeping and dealing in negro slaves as openly as was done in America. There is abundance of romance connected with the secretion, losing, and finding again of a treasure chest, around which hung a mysterious suspicion of piracy. The boys who begin to read this book will not be likely to leave it unfinished.

In an excellent series of eighteenpenny books for young people, we find:—Well Done, by C. D. Michael, which contains accounts of how brave men—missionaries, doctors, engineers, &c.—persevered and succeeded in the attainment of their ideals in the face of tremendous difficulties. Marigold's Fancies, by L. E. Tiddeman, is a brightly written narrative of the ups and downs of a little girl who was most thoughtful for others. The correction of her mistakes and the success of her good plans are equally interesting. Philip's Inheritance, by F. Spenser, is a striking tale of womanly devotion, and of the rescuing from the toils of a man more than usually beset by evil influences. In the Bonds of Silence, by J. L. Hornibrook, contains a striking story of the lifting of a great shadow from a young life, and of the gracious leading of a soul into the light. In Donald's Victory, by Lydia Phillips, it is shown how the power of Christ solves the difficulties of life, from whatever point of view these may be presented.

An equally good series at one shilling includes Sunshine and Snow, by Harold Bindloss, whose adventures by field and flood are graphically described in a fashion which an active boy will thoroughly appreciate. The passages in the life story of an Australian lady teacher so interestingly told in At the Bend of the Creek, by E. Gertrude and Annie A. Hart, will appeal warmly to her sisters in the homeland and elsewhere. The stirring and well-written tale of adventure in Central America, which is told in Donalblane of Darien, by J. Macdonald Oxley, gathers round a serious episode in the history of Scotland seldom recalled to mind. Those who are looking for reward books will do well to include Crown Jewels, by Heather Grey, a brightly-written narrative and a true picture of life in stations high and low.

PRESS REVIEWS.

Expository Times.—The intensely spiritual quality of the book invests its dicta, to the receptive mind, with an impressiveness and an authority independent of the startling analogies between natural and spiritual laws which the author discovers in the latest findings of biological science. . . . Compact of thought and expression, it is absorbing in its interest; to sit down to read the first "Study" is to be held until the last chapter has been covered, and to read the book once is to read it again.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE.

The Outlook (U.S.A.).—A keen, devout, and cultured mind here essays the exhibition of spiritual truths as the complement of physical. His standpoint is that of one trained in the older theology, and grown almost out of it into the newer, yet holding to it by an attenuated thread; fond of old phraseology, but infusing into it new and larger thought. This is one of the helpful forward-pointing books characteristic of the present transitional period of religious thought. It is significant both of the vitality of the fundamental Christian truths, and of the freedom exercised in the most conservative Churches to restate them in accord with larger learning.

SUNDAY, November 23. 1 Kings xi.

IT seems incredible that Solomon should have fallen thus. He was the beloved of the Lord, who had made him king over all Israel (Neh. xiii. 26); but he not only built idolatrous temples for his wives, but went after these false gods himself. Having begun in the Spirit, he ended in the flesh. Thinking himself wise, he became foolish, and exchanged the likeness of the incorruptible God for the likeness of the creatures which He had made (Rom. i. 22, 23). In the solemn words of the Letter to Laodicea, he thought that he was rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing, and knew not that in the judgment of eternity he was miserable, wretched, poor, blind, and naked.

The cause of this terrible lapse was the multiplication of wives, after the fashion of Oriental monarchs—the women being drawn from the surrounding nations. "Even him did strange women cause to sin." Solomon is an illustration of the fact that they who are most open to the spiritual are most in danger of the sensual. He is a standing warning against the soul's indulgence to any degree in sensual passion, for it is impossible to stop when once the limits of self-restraint are passed. One indulgence inevitably leads to another; and, as the sea eats away the foundations of the cliffs, till they topple into the foaming breakers, so does impurity overthrow the strongest, noblest men, if once admitted into heart and life.

It is very interesting, from a spiritual point of view, to notice the uprising of these three adversaries, to disturb the peace of Solomon's old age. As long as a man's ways please the Lord, He constitutes Himself his defender; but when the heart ceases to be perfect (whole), enemies and difficulties spring up from the dust.

MONDAY, November 24. 1 Kings xii.

It is remarkable that Shechem, rather than Jerusalem, or even Hebron, was chosen for this great convocation. It suggests that already the disruption of the kingdom was resolved upon. It was an act of political imbecility to return such an answer to the appeal of the people; but behind the suggestions of Rehoboam's councillors a Divine purpose was at work (15). What a glimpse this gives us into the secret counsel-chamber of the Most High. He does as He pleases among the inhabitants of the earth, and we may well take up the daily newspaper with the words which I heard the late Principal Reynolds, of Cheshunt, once utter: "I want to see how my Heavenly Father is governing the world."

What God ordains must stand, and we cannot reverse it by force of arms; but it is a great tribute to the religious principles by which the majority of the people were governed, that, on hearing Shemaiah's words, they dispersed.

The setting-up of these two calves was bitterly resented by the prophets in all after-days. Jeroboam's designation hereafter was, "who made Israel to sin." That he should presume to substitute a feast after the devising of his own heart (33) for the Feast of Tabernacles, and a month later; that he should act as chief or high priest; and that he should ordain priests of all who wished, were abominations which elicited the most vehement reproaches from the servants of God (take Hosea for instance). The root of the whole sin was unbelief, which substituted the counsels of expediency for simple faith in the Divine Promise (vv. 26, 27, and xi. 37, 38). When we once begin to act after our own wisdom, there is no depth to which we may not fall. We, too, may exchange God for the worship of golden calves. Let us watch lest our hearts depart from the living One!

TUESDAY, November 25. 1 Kings xiii.

They whom God chooses to be the instruments of His purposes must be very watchful. First, they must keep themselves from all evil associations, "they must neither eat bread nor drink water" with the ungodly—i.e., they must be separate and not touch the unclean thing. Next, they must put their message before their own gratification—with an awful reverence for God, they must go and come. And lastly, when they have received their instructions from God Himself, they must not allow themselves to be diverted by any other voices that may speak to them.

This was the profound mistake of this man of God. He knew precisely what God wished him to do and say; but he permitted himself to be influenced by the strong pressure of the old prophet, who also professed a Divine revelation. But those who are accustomed to deal with God directly, must not take second-hand directions from any human lip.

The penalty was very severe; but it was necessary. Else Jeroboam might have argued that he was not a true prophet, and that the word which he spake as God's would not stand. The prophet's death for his disobedience must have been an awful message to the king. If a man of God was not spared, how should he fare? If judgment begins at the house of God, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? Remember, too, that death is not the worst calamity that can befal; spiritual deterioration is worse.

WEDNESDAY, November 26. 1 Kings xiv.

How blind men become when they sin against their conscience! The window of the soul is shuttered against the light. "Their foolish heart is darkened." Surely if Abijah were able to predict the issue of the son's sickness, he would not be deceived by the mother's disguise. It is, however, perfectly obvious why Jeroboam was so eager to preserve this incognito, for if it were known that he was seeking the advice of a prophet of the Lord, it might lead to the whole people losing faith in the system which he had taken such pains to build up. But what an awful experience must he have been passing through during these years! Evidently he felt that his gods were no gods. He maintained the outward semblance of veneration, but in his heart he knew that the whole system was a lie.

Jewish historians say that this exception was made in Abijah's case (13), because he interceded with his father that all Israelites who wished might be allowed to go to the feasts at Jerusalem without molestation. There is always a discrimination in the Divine judgments.

How often the Divine verdict on our life comes to us when we are disguised! We take up a paper and read of some case in the law courts, with the verdict passed on it by the judge and public opinion, and at once we see ourselves; or we overhear a conversation about someone else, and we know the true colour of our acts. We may be thankful for these startling revelations, that we may know ourselves, and be saved. This description of matters under Rehoboam is shocking. How swift is the corruption of the best, as typified by the substitution of brazen shields for those of gold! To what may not we come if the grace of God does not restrain!

THURSDAY, November 27. 1 Kings xv.

Abijam's mother was descended from Absalom, and it is hardly surprising that the virus of that unhappy ancestry poisoned the young king's reign; but mercy was shown to him for David's sake. The lamp was burning low, but it was preserved from extinction.

For Asa's reign we must turn for further information to the Book of Chronicles, where evidence is given of his truly religious character, at least during the earlier portion of his reign. Even Maachah, his grandmother, was removed from her position (compare 2 and 10, but the words father and mother are used loosely, see v. 3). Though, on the whole, his policy was directed towards the overthrow of idolatry, yet it was apparently impossible to carry out a complete reformation (14), and he seems to have ultimately suffered great personal deterioration as the result of his compromise (2 Chron. xvi. 7, 10-12).

Under the circumstances described in these chapters, the wonder is that the worship of Jehovah, which was so opposed to the general tendency of the national life and of surrounding nations, did not fall into disuse. That it did not, was due to the influence of the prophetic body, which was destined to become more and more influential; and this was the result of God's special interference.

His Holy Spirit strove against the infection of abominable idolatry, which was continually breaking out. It is thus, also, that in infinite patience God deals with us. His Spirit strives against the flesh, that we may not do what we otherwise would; but if He is thwarted, there is overthrow and rejection, as of the Ten Tribes.

FRIDAY, November 28. 1 Kings xvi.

What a dreary record is afforded in these chapters of apostasy and revolution, of idolatry and national disaster. Perhaps the great mass of the people—the peasantry—were not greatly affected by those dynastic changes; but severe judgments of famine and drought were soon to make them also realize what an evil and bitter thing it was to desert the Fountain of living waters, and to hew out broken cisterns which could hold none.

Four times over in this chapter we meet the phrase, "provoke to anger" (7, 13, 26, 33). To idolatry was added gross intemperance (9), and the fruit was suicide, anarchy, and civil war (18, 21, 22). But great as were these evils, they were destined to be surpassed (30).

Hitherto Israel had violated specially and principally the Second Commandment, but Ahab first openly led in the violation of the First; and this was largely due to the influence of Jezebel. What a mighty influence woman exercises for good or evil! The effect of all these sins was rapidly telling upon the mass of the people. In no previous age would any have dared, like Hiel, to flout the Divine curse. But he discovered that length of time does not wear out the abiding force of God's word, which is quick, sharp, and penetrating.

SATURDAY, November 29. 1 Kings xvii.

There was an open heaven between Elijah (i.e., Jehovah is my God) and the Lord. It seemed as though he were always standing before Him, waiting to be sent forth on any of His errands. In this he reminds us of Gabriel (Luke i. 19). Oh, that we might do so from this moment, not in our own righteousness, but by the grace and through the merits of Jesus Christ, that whatever God may want done or said, He shall find us meet for His use. From the reference made to this event by James v. 17, it seems that Elijah had been urging Ahab to put away his sins; but, having failed, and as a last resource, he prayed that rain and dew might be withheld.

God always provides for his faithful servants, either by the ravens or the widow woman. None of them that trust in Him, and do His bidding, shall be desolate. But they are not without trials, since their own character is dear to God. He must take them into the dark to fix His messages on their hearts, as the photographer takes the plate. It must have been a trial to Elijah's faith, first to see the dwindling of the brook, then the abject poverty of the woman who was directed to support him, and finally the sickness and death of her child. But through them all his faith held fast to the living God. It was still, "O Lord my God" (20).

How little did the widow realize the greatness of her reward (Matt. x. 41, 42). But she was singled out from all the other widows in Israel because of the faith which she manifested from the first (12-15). She stood the great test of making Elijah's cake first, believing that afterwards enough would be left for her son and herself, and for this, and because of the character it indicated, she was specially chosen and blessed (Luke iv. 26). Our real selves are manifested in trifles. Such may happen to you to-day, and alter the whole course of your after-life. Watch and pray! F. B. M.

Home Missions.

For "Jack Ashore."

THE "Queen Victoria Seamen's Rest," the splendid pile of buildings which has been erected at Poplar as a permanent Home for the Wesleyan Mission to Seamen in East London, is at last completed; a consummation due in a large measure to the perseverance and unremitting toil of the esteemed superintendent, Rev. David Roe.

IN "SAILOR TOWN."

The Rest, conveniently situated in "Sailor Town," includes provision for many departments of work, all of which will benefit the seamen ashore. There is a large assembly room, a refreshment room, reading and recreation rooms, and other accommodation for officers and seamen of various ranks, as well as dormitories, which will be available for seafaring men on reasonable terms. The committee of the Seamen's Hospital Society, "Dreadnought," is renting a portion of the building, and thus there will be free medical treatment for sailors on the premises. A settlement for young men, voluntary helpers in the work, is also being established in connection with the scheme; while another important feature is the capacious block of model dwellings erected primarily for the accommodation of sailors and their families. Here men may leave their wives and children, to some extent in the care of the mission workers, and the income derived from this source will be an important item towards the upkeep of the institution.

THE OPENING CEREMONY.

The opening ceremony was performed on Thursday afternoon last by H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, who, with the Duke, received a warm welcome to the district. After formally declaring the building open, Her Royal Highness proceeded to inspect the Rest, and evinced deep interest in the arrangements. An ascent was made to the roof, where the Princess, with kindly sympathy for the sailor's welfare, undertook to provide seats where the men could sit and enjoy "such fresh air as is obtainable in the East-End."

The public meeting which followed was held in the "John Cory" Hall of the institution, a delightful room, characteristic of the combined taste and economy displayed in the planning of the Rest. It was brightly decorated for the occasion, prominent among the flags being that of the Mission itself, which has the Union Jack quartered on a blue ground, inscribed, "Q.V.S.R.," the large assembly of friends, gathered for the occasion, including such representative Methodists as Rev. Marshall Hartley and Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P.

Sir JOHN MCDOUGALL, who presided, referred to the bad old days when the "land shark" found the sailor an easy prey, and philanthropic undertakings were few indeed. Nowadays, the law and the Board of Trade do much to ameliorate the position of the sailor, but even to-day, when he arrives in a port after a voyage, there are always evil people willing to greet him because he is a man of substance. The Rest will encourage the seaman between his voyages, and afford him, when ashore in London, a protection from abounding evils. He will also be medically cared for, if necessary, and, in connection with the London County Council, technical instruction will be given, so that "Jack" may be better fitted to discharge his duty at sea.

ALL NATIONALITIES WELCOMED.

The origin and progress of the Mission were next outlined by Rev. DAVID ROE, who said that the Rest partly stands on ground formerly occupied by a public-house. The work has been going on in a small way since 1834, but four years ago a more vigorous policy was adopted. It was intended to provide accommodation for men of all grades, ranks, and nationalities, during the day and night, on reasonable terms. Of the £14,000 which the building has cost some £8,000 had been received or promised, so that £6,000 is required to free the building from debt. The King has taken a practical interest in the work, allowing the Rest to be called after his honoured mother. The aim of the Mission is the salvation and uplifting of sailors.

Among subsequent speakers was the DUKE OF ARGYLL, who said that the institution is well placed and well appointed. The country owes an immense debt to sailors since so many of the products used in the course of daily life are sea-borne. The number of sailors using the port of London is very large, and the Rest will be of high value in ministering to their needs.

At the conclusion of the meeting a memorial tablet was unveiled by Alderman AGAR, of York, who emphasized the spiritual side of the work.

In the evening another enthusiastic meeting was held, and as a result of the day's efforts the debt was somewhat lessened; but a very considerable balance has still to be raised in order to free from debt this heroic enterprise of Methodism in the best interests of "Jack ashore."

Soldiers in Conference.

SELDOM, if ever, in the course of the year does Exeter Hall present a more patriotic appearance than on the occasion of the annual military Convention arranged by the Soldiers' Christian Association. Year by year the usefulness of the Convention is becoming more widely recognised, and on Thursday last the opportunity of meeting together for mutual help and encouragement was embraced by Christian representatives of a larger number of regiments than has been the case before. Some 360 Christian soldiers attended, representing 47 stations; and there were also present over 100 officers and 40 chaplains, besides a large number of subscribers and friends.

The proceedings opened at noon with a meeting for prayer and praise, at which Colonel H. G. MACGREGOR presided.

SEEKING AND SEEING GOD.

A number of warm personal testimonies were given by members of many different regiments, after which a thoughtful address was delivered by Bishop TAYLOR SMITH, Chaplain-General to H.M. Forces. The object of the Convention, he remarked, would be achieved if it enabled them to have a new vision of God. It was only by seeking God that any could hope to see Him. With the vision of God there would come a vision of self, and the picture would not be a pleasant one. But with the humble confession of need there would be given pardon and grace, and being cleansed and enriched themselves they would be able to give out to others from full hearts. The bishop recalled the circumstances of our Lord's repeated charge to Peter—"Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?"—and emphasized the fact that a mere profession of love is not sufficient; there must be definite following. He urged the need for individual effort, and appealed to the men to remember that after all it is their life and not their profession that tells.

At the luncheon which followed (given by Sir George Williams) letters expressing regret at their inability to be present were read from Lord Roberts, Lord Wolseley, Generals French and Gatacre, Major Gamble, and others. One and all wrote sympathetically of the work which the Association has accomplished, and giving assurance of their hearty endorsement to all its undertakings.

THE ASSOCIATION AT WORK.

The afternoon gathering was chiefly taken up by the soldiers themselves giving their testimony, both to the power of the God in Christ, and to the help the Association has been to them in witnessing for Him. The secretary (Mr. SAMUEL E. BURROW) gave the roll-call, which was responded to by members of brigades from Windsor, Canterbury, Hythe, Edinburgh, Woolwich, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Dublin, Shorncliffe, &c. Sir GEORGE WILLIAMS, who presided, having spoken a few words of counsel to the soldiers and presented medals to two Army Scripture Readers, the Secretary cordially welcomed the members of the Association who had served in South Africa. The Council was proud of the men who had upheld the noblest traditions of the army; and the hopes of those who remained at home, that the members would be true to the Master as well as to the colours they served, had not been misplaced. They had not been heroes only, but in the hour of victory they had shown themselves to be gentlemen.

In a word of fraternal exhortation Mr. Burrow appealed to the men, who now sheathed the sword of warfare, to take a fresh grip of the Sword of the Spirit, and to remember that the greatest battle-ground is the human heart. Only by constantly watching and praying could they hope to be made meet for the inheritance of saints, and worthy to receive the crown of life which shall be given to all who have fought the good fight of faith.

A number of testimonies were then given by officers and men of various regiments. Serjeant J. G. HILL recalled the efforts made in the early stages of the campaign, and Sergeant NEELEY testified to the mysterious manner in which the way had been opened up for him to speak the Word in season. Quartermaster-Sergeant BROWN spoke of the fruitful efforts which had been made at Natal and other places, and the zeal with which Christian men in the ranks used every opportunity of winning souls. Colonel PHILLIPS and others added appreciative words concerning the Association's work, and a telling address was given by Rev. E. P. LOWRY, senior Wesleyan chaplain in South Africa. Many were deeply moved as the speaker related touching instances of the fortitude with which physical suffering was borne when the heart was at rest and the faith remained unmoved.

A meeting was also held in the evening, and was largely attended.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

WATERFORD.

IN Waterford there are but 2,000 Protestants out of a population of 26,000, but the enthusiasm aroused by the mission of Dr. J. Q. A. HENRY and Mr. ARMON JONES was great, and deep impressions were made. Rev. Canon ROBINSON said:—"Dr. Henry combines in a wonderful way moderation of statement with the greatest moral earnestness." Addressing Dr. Henry, he said "the very success of the mission represents the travail of your own soul."

WEXFORD.

The meetings at Wexford commenced on the evening of Wednesday, the 12th inst., and were carried on for three successive evenings, with two afternoon meetings in addition—one for country people and one for children; all were well-attended, notwithstanding that the weather was inclement. Dr. Henry's charming manner with children was greatly appreciated, and Mr. Armon Jones' beautiful rendering of many sweet songs evoked admiration.

All denominations in the town were in hearty accord with the movement, and a well-attended prayer-meeting held at the beginning of the week gave evidence of a united desire for Divine blessing on the work.

As in many other towns in the south of Ireland, Protestants are only about seven to eight per cent. of the population; in the case of Wexford there are about 700 all told in the town and its immediate neighbourhood, and as the young people especially are very well looked after by the churches, and are mostly members of Bands of Hope, it was not to be expected that many pledges would result.

Eighty pledges were taken in all, but an equally important result was attained in the awakening of Christian people to a clearer realization of their responsibilities as Church members in the matter of temperance reform.

This was Dr. Henry's principal theme, and very ably did he press it home.

On Friday afternoon last, Dr. Henry spoke to a large audience of young people, including the Wexford Boys' Brigade, who attended in uniform. His practical and sympathetic address was delightedly received, as also was Mr. Jones's rendering of "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" and "I shall know Him by the print of the nails in His hands."

The last meeting was on the same evening, and to a very full audience Dr. Henry gave a telling address on "Is the Bible a Total Abstinence Book?" Mr. Armon Jones again sang with power, and aroused intense enthusiasm. The meeting proved a joyous climax to all that had gone before. Attention was rapt from first to last, and the crowded audience was deeply moved as the missioner showed the dishonour to God and the Church brought about by the drink. The secretary of the Mission said:—"I have been a teetotaler for thirty years. I have always defended my abstinence on the ground of Christian expediency; but this is the happiest hour of these thirty years, for I now see that total abstinence rests on the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture." The chairman declared that henceforth he would do his utmost to banish the intoxicating cup from the table of the Lord.

It is believed that every Protestant child in the place has now signed the pledge, and out of the 700 members of the community no fewer than 400 are pledged abstainers. It was to the regret of all who had the privilege of attending that the mission was so very brief. Much of its effectiveness was due to the choir and to the earnest band of ladies who took the pledges.

BELFAST.

On Saturday evening last Dr. Henry commenced a mission at Belfast in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. At the inaugural meeting in the capacious hall of the Y.M.C.A. there was a large attendance, including ministers and other supporters of the Temperance movement.

Mr. George D. Leathem, who presided, spoke of Dr. Henry as one of the greatest living advocates of the great cause of Temperance. Rev. Henry Montgomery also bade the missioner welcome, and in the course of a sympathetic address emphasized the value of personal work.

Dr. Henry spoke with power, dwelling more particularly on the responsibilities of Christians, pointing out that although Temperance work is difficult and delicate, yet as God's work it must be undertaken.

On the Sabbath Dr. Henry conducted three services. In the morning he was at the Crescent Presbyterian Church (Rev. John McIlveen's), and made a stirring appeal to his hearers. Dr. Henry also preached in Malone Church in the afternoon, and in May Street Church in the evening. The congregation at each service was large, and great interest was manifested in the subject.

Personalia.

Rev. Isaac F. Row has now sailed for India. He may be addressed at the headquarters of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, Bombay.

Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, B.D., is conducting the "Bible Talks with Young Men" at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Saturday afternoons. The subjects studied are those of the afternoon series of the International Sunday-School Lessons, and many young men who are Sunday-school teachers find the class a great help in preparing their lessons.

North Scottish Fishing Ports.—Rev. T. Riley, superintendent of the North of Scotland Wesleyan Methodist Mission, has found lantern services remarkably effective in attracting the people. Last winter such services brought much encouragement, and Mr. Riley desires to renew them at the towns along the north-east coast among the fisher-folk. He is, however, needing new sets of slides and seeks helps in the matter. His address is 55, Queen Street, Peterhead, N.B.

Out of the World.

IN His great prayer, recorded in John xvii., our Lord said, "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil." Yet, would you believe it, my dear children, some men and women have so greatly erred from the way of God as to shut themselves up away from the world, and that in the name of Christian sanctity! It is not surprising that people who take their own course against God's revealed will should fall into many sins. Assuredly those who shut themselves up away from the world are not "kept from the evil."

Now look at the picture. I think I hear you say: What cold desolation and painful loneliness! Here you see a Cloister, a place of religious seclusion, an establishment in which monks and nuns live in retirement from other people. The buildings in general are called Convents, because the inmates form a community; and Monasteries, because the inmates maintain solitude in their life and engagements. Many happy and bright young men and women enter the doors of these places; but in a short time the sweetness and light are worn out of their lives, and sorrow and bitterness become their lot. When I think of convent life, I am ready to weep for the sufferings of the many lads and lasses who have been enticed within the walls of great enclosures, only to find it more and more difficult to serve God, and more and more irksome to please those in authority over them.

Though religious institutions, Convents have no place in the Christian system as expounded in the Holy Bible. Hundreds of years ago, however, agents of the Roman Catholic Church copied the old heathen religions in this respect. In some cases, under firm rule exercised by noble men and women, the communities became famous for their patronage of the arts and literature. They made books before "the schoolmaster was abroad," as he is to-day, and copied precious manuscripts before printing types were invented. In other cases, and at length more generally, lower and meaner motives ruled, and the convents became centres of corruption and disorder, and the inmates were reduced to ignorance and laziness which I do not care to describe. All the time, moreover, they regarded themselves as very religious because they babbled over Latin prayers and attended to the ceremonies prescribed for the community. Convents absorbed the wealth of the people, and they yielded no corresponding benefit; in fact, they often became "synagogues of Satan."

When you read of Luther and his work, or study other great chapters in Church History, remember how hurtful has been the influence of monks and nuns, convents and monasteries. Christ said to his disciples: "Ye are the light of the world; a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. v. 14-16). It is impossible to obey this command of Christ by retiring from the world. Imagine yourself pacing a cloister, like that shown in the picture, and thereby testifying for Christ! There is no one to hear your testimony, no one to "see your good works and glorify your Heavenly Father." For Christians to hide themselves from the gaze of men, and affect piety on that account, is to run in the way of the truant prophet Jonah, who "fled from the presence of the Lord" when told to go and preach to the Ninevites.

The Conventual System (for that is the name by which the habit of living in convents is called) has been the source of nameless evils. One sin begets another; if you disobey God's law in one direction, you will find it easy to disobey it in others. Think of young girls and growing lads, who hardly know their own minds, being urged into this unnatural kind of life. By and by, they feel they could better serve God out of doors; but it is too late. They have taken a vow, and now they must remain! They become soured in disposition, and look at everything from the point of view of disappointed people; in fact, they long for death! All the time they are surrounded by such as are either equally sorrowful, or heartless and without compassion; at length they die without the consolations of a friend, and in a place where Christ is often named, but certainly not served as He desired and commanded. This is inexpressibly sad.

In many countries convents have from time to time been suppressed by law. In reading English History you will have noted that such was the case in England in the sixteenth century. In some lands where they are now tolerated they are periodically inspected, in order that they may not be—what they too often are—religious prisons. Week after week in Continental countries "Revelations of Convent Life" are reported in the newspapers, and it is certain that a great many cruel deeds and much wickedness take place within the cloisters. Think of these things, dear children, and may God spare you to do your part to help the helpless in coming days. When you arrive at years of responsibility, you may be called upon, as citizens, to support legislation for suppression or reform in our land, where convents and monasteries are now so numerous. God grant that the day of emancipation may come soon, when all such "habitations of cruelty" may be for ever demolished. J. W. T.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, November 30, 1902.

Gideon and the Three Hundred (Jud. vii. 1-8, 16-21).

Golden Text.—Psa. cxviii. 8.

THE Midianites were a fierce, warlike, bold race of wandering marauders from beyond Edom and Moab. Israel's condition described Jud. vi. 2, instead of as in Deut. vi. 10-12. "Forgot the Lord."

Gideon, His Character and Testing.

Courage, faith, ingenuity, influence. His second name, "A fighter of Baal." A follower of Jehovah, in an idolatrous home. His father's adherence showed the power of his influence for God. Two trials of faith. Two signs of guidance.

Two kinds of heroes, earthly and heavenly. Earth's hero (John v. 44).—Aims—bounded by time. Works—things temporal. Honours—praise of man. Rewards—titles and riches of earth.

Heaven's hero (Heb. xi. 6, 25-27).—Believes God. Inspired by His Spirit. Follows the Lord wholly. Denies self. Above all for the praise of God.

"Jesus . . . who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame." Moses, Joshua, Nehemiah, Daniel, Paul.

The Army and their Weapons.

Thirty-two thousand enlisted, but the regiments had to pass through two refinings and the dross thrown out (Judges vii. 3, 4-7). Dogs in the chase will catch laps as they run. The wandering people of Asia, when in haste, and they come to a stream, do not stoop down deliberately on their knees to drink, but bend forward as much as is necessary to bring their hand into contact with the water, and throw it into their mouths with such rapidity and dexterity that they do not drop a particle.

Soldiers wanted for the battles of the Lord who will endure hardness (2 Tim. ii. 3); know how to obey (John ii. 5); brave, watchful, united (1 Cor. xvi. 13).

Soldiers not wanted, ease-loving, self-indulgent, cowards—for they would make others as faint-hearted as themselves (Deut. xx. 8); changeable (Luke ix. 62).

Many are ready to wear the uniform, but take fright when they see the foe (Judges vii. 1). The best cure for fear is given in 2 Chron. xx. 3-13. The finger of scorn or the laugh of ridicule will sometimes turn away a new recruit from the ranks.

The Battle and the Victory.

Israel's danger did not lie in their weakness, but in their pride, self-confidence, and boastful spirit (v. 2). "We only number 500, all told, General," said an officer to his commander-in-chief." "And how many do you count me for?" was the great man's reply.

Gideon, 300 men, and "the Lord of Hosts." "The Sword of the Lord and Gideon."

Lessons.

(1) It must have been a sore trial to the faith of Gideon to see his army reduced to one man for every 450 of the foe.

(2) The Lord can use our ingenuity in His service. The winepress was used by Gideon as a threshing-floor because it hid the corn, so the pitcher to hide the light till it was wanted.

(3) Gideon's question and misgivings arose from no lack of faith. The Lord assured him of His real presence and help in the battle, just as He will say to the frailest and youngest of His followers who trust Him (Ps. xxxii. 8)

(4) God seeks for boys and girls, men and women, to fight for Him against the great enemy of souls (2 Chron. xvi. 9).

(5) Our weapon. The Bread of Life, the trumpet of the Gospel. "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God," "in earthen vessels," "the power may be of God, not of us" (2 Cor. iv. 6, 7).

TESTED BY GOD.

The town of Toledo, in Spain, has a world-wide reputation for the quality of its swords. In the manufacture of the weapons very severe tests are adopted. Each sword when finished is thrust against a plate on the wall and bent until it forms at least three-parts of a circle. Then, in order to further test its strength, the weapon is forcibly struck edgeways upon a leaden table, and should the steel successfully resist the double trial it is passed as satisfactory. The Lord said unto Gideon, "The people are yet too many. I will try and test them for thee" (verse 4). To-day, as in the time of Gideon, every man's work shall be made manifest. The fire shall try it of what sort it is. May we all be willing to pray, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts.

TRIFLES AS TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

There is a certain house in the heart of the United States which stands between two waterways. One of these streams leads to the Mississippi, and the other in the direction of Lake Erie. It has been remarked that a raindrop, falling upon the sloping roof of the house, may be carried either to the great river of the south or the mighty lake of the north. A mere puff of wind may determine the direction of the raindrop, and an apparent trifle with us may affect the whole future of our lives. The standing and the kneeling Israelites (v. 5) indicated, either a readiness for the enterprise in which they were engaged, or a concern for their own personal comfort. So with us; our actions are often but the outcome of our inward desires, and the so-called trifles of life are in reality displays of the real character of the innermost heart.

THE LORD WILL SAVE.

Morrison, who was a pioneer missionary to China, was once asked tauntingly if he thought that with his religion he would be able to make any impression on the idolatry of the great Celestial empire. Morrison's reply was typical, "I expect God will!" and with faith in the Lord's might, he entered upon the work. The Lord said unto Gideon, "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand" (v. 7).

Testimony the Best Praise (Psa. cxvi. Jas. i. 27).

EVIDENTLY the Psalmist, whoever he may have been, had just escaped from some terrible trouble. He had been held in the pains of Sheol and compassed by the cords of death. These and similar expressions throughout the Psalm suggest that, through physical illness, he had been brought to death's door.

Under these circumstances he had prayed most earnestly for help, asking for deliverance. Like Hezekiah, under similar circumstances, he had turned his face to the wall and pleaded for life. And the Lord had heard his voice and his supplication, delivering his soul from death, his eyes from tears, and his feet from falling. Now there had come a high tide of ecstacy and thankfulness. He knew not how to say all he felt. A life of devotion was the least return that he could make (2). Let us learn from him how to praise.

1. Take God's gifts (13). This is the best way of thanking God—to accept and enjoy what He has sent. Not everyone does this. I have met many in my life who have been afraid of receiving and enjoying God's gifts. It was as though they must put bitter herbs into every savoury dish to take off its too great pleasure. I think that the truest way to thank God is to take every cup which He fills with salvation as from His hands, and to lift it to the lips, not to sip it hastily, but to drink as much as He permits, with reverence and thankfulness and joy.

2. Reaffirm your desire to serve Him (16). Say again and again, "I am Thy servant." If you have solemnly surrendered yourself to God, it is not needful to repeat that initial act. What is really done once need not and cannot be done again. But we may declare our glad acquiescence in our position, and be proud to wear the livery of our King.

3. Praise Him (17). The Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of this (xiii. 15). We must offer God the fruit of our lips. Hosea speaks of the calves of our lips (xiv. 2). We do not praise God enough in private, and this is the reason why we are often so still in the sanctuary.

I have often been blessed in saying over to God, aloud, in the early morning, the glorious words of the Te Deum. The service of God's House ought to be so ordered that there is large opportunity of praise, as well as of thanksgiving. The latter rejoices in all that God has done, the former in all that He is.

Especially when we have received some great benefit at God's hands, we should take an opportunity of special praise. In many cases this might take the form of some gift of money to the missionary cause, or for the circulation of the Scriptures. We might all do more in this direction, using our money to purchase really good literature, to be distributed by our own hands.

The passage from the Epistle of James contains another suggestion, that any great deliverance is a summons to more pure and undefiled religion, with its double expression; first, to go forth on deeds of mercy to those who are in sorrow and need; and secondly, to live a life of uncorrupted simplicity and purity.

It is on the latter that I would lay some stress. Perhaps it is the more difficult of the two. To keep from grieving the Holy Spirit of God, to wear the white flower of a blameless life, to be clad in the white, stainless robes which are washed in the blood of the Lamb—this is one of the best tributes of hearts overflowing with gratitude and love. This is a cup of cold water which quenches the thirst of our King.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Irish Evangelization Society.

THE valley of the Braid, in co. Antrim, where such a gracious work was experienced during the year of the great revival, '59, has had a mission in the largest movable hall belonging to the Society. For seven weeks the meetings were continued nightly, the people coming in large numbers across the river and fields, and the interest deepened each night until the close. We were privileged to see many rich tokens of God's saving power.

T. M. Carleton.

Mr. Farquhar McLennan at Stranraer.

A remarkable series of meetings, begun on October 19, and conducted by Mr. Farquhar McLennan, has just been brought to a close in connection with Sheuchan U.F. Church, Stranraer. The mission was looked forward to by many with expectation, and we have not been disappointed. God hath indeed done great things for us. Night by night the church was filled with people, and the after-meetings were very large. Hardly a night went by without decisions for God. About 120 passed through the inquiry-room, but we feel sure that many more were reached that as yet we know nothing of. On the last night there was a decided "break" among the young men, quite a number coming boldly forward.

Jas. Montgomery.

The Weaver Brothers at Sutton Bridge.

The visit of these well-known missioners to Sutton Bridge was eagerly looked forward to by many of God's children. The work for years in this locality has been difficult, but from the first Sunday night when the Primitive Methodist Church was filled to the doors a gracious influence prevailed.

As the meetings proceeded the mission deepened in spiritual power, and before the second Sunday we were in the midst of a gracious revival. Night after night the workers were sorely taxed by the numbers of those entering the inquiry-rooms. The work has been among the best of the people attending the churches, and a large addition to church membership is looked for. The gatherings were far-reaching in their effect, all the Free Churches joining most heartily. A men's meeting on the second Sunday afternoon was a striking occasion, the church being filled by many men who had not entered a sanctuary for years. C.

Gipsy Smith in Greenock.

Under the auspices of the Methodist, Congregational and Baptist Churches, Gipsy Smith commenced a ten days' mission in Greenock on Saturday evening, November 8. The meetings are being held in the Town Hall, and the attendances are far in excess of anything that has been seen for twenty years. Since the great mission of 1882, which was commenced by Mr. D. L. Moody and carried on for three months by Mr. John M. Scroggie, there has been no such stir in Greenock as there is at the present time. The Town Hall is the largest building for public use that Greenock possesses, and it is crowded out each night long before the time for beginning the service; and the visible results as seen in the numbers that go into the inquiry room are phenomenal. Several hundreds have, during the first week, been dealt with.

On Tuesday, the 11th, the Gipsy paid a visit to the Orphan Homes of Scotland, at Bridge of Weir, and held an afternoon meeting with the children, his visit being greatly enjoyed. J. C.

Mr. P. R. Hurditch at Ilford.

The Ilford Y.M.C.A. concluded a week's Mission to Men on Friday, October 31, conducted by Mr. Philip Hurditch. On Saturday evening, October 25, the evangelist met the workers, and emphasized the need of consecration of life as well as lip if the mission was to prove successful. On Sunday, 26th, at three o'clock, Mr. Hurditch addressed the men's Bible class, and at 7.30 held a large meeting in the Town Hall, speaking with great power, and advising men, according to Amos iv. 12, to "Prepare to meet God." Each week evening following, in the Y.M.C.A. rooms, he delivered a very forcible and telling address, urging men to surrender heart and life. In response to his appeal a good number rose asking for prayer, and deciding for Christ. On Wednesday the assistance of the "Tottenham Working Men's Gospel Band" very much assisted in the effectiveness of the service. Friday evening the meeting was thrown open to both sexes, and a very cheerful, happy service was held. The work of grace begun is continuing, and a large number of the members intend to follow up and supplement the results of the mission.

D. J. Simons, Hon. Secretary.

The Lighthouse Mission, Croydon.

Mr. W. Collard has been holding a ten days' mission at the "Lighthouse," Wilford Road, Croydon, with encouraging results, his striking experience and homely illustrations riveting attention nightly. The thoroughfare is densely peopled, for the most part by the working class, very few of whom regularly attend any place of worship. Almost every night the Mission room has been filled with interested listeners, and there have been some striking cases of decision. Thursday, November 6, was set apart for a men's meeting, when a "straight talk" was given on the kindred evils of drink, gambling, and impurity. On the Monday afternoon following, a meeting for women only was held, and there have been three children's meetings. The workers are much encouraged, having long laboured previously with little sign of blessing. Their prayers have now been answered by the blessing of some in whom they were deeply interested. Mr. Jack Jones, "the converted coster," has continued the work. The principle obstacles here are drink and immorality, the former being in evidence at many of the meetings. T. G.

Mr. Charles E. Barraclough at Beeston.

Mr. Charles E. Barraclough has concluded a fortnight's services at the Gospel Mission Hall, Beeston. This was the second visit of the evangelist. On the previous occasion a great time of ingathering was experienced; and this time, also, large audiences have come together nightly to hear the Gospel preached.

The presence and power of the Holy Spirit was manifest during the progress of the mission; many have been dealt with in the inquiry rooms and have decided for Christ. Deep conviction of sin still continues amongst the ungodly, and some have yielded to the strivings of the Spirit since the missioner left. Anticipating that the hall would be far too small for the second Sunday's meetings, another building was also taken, and to this were directed all the children and young people, and also those adults who were unable to gain admission to our hall. Both places were full, and a third meeting was held after the conclusion of these two, at 8.30 p m. Many who were unable to obtain admission to the earlier services came in, and we had a glorious time. The whole place has been stirred by our brother's visit.

John Paling, Hon. Secretary.

Mr. Josiah Nix at Bridlington Quay.

Bridlington Quay was deeply stirred by the recent ten days' mission of Mr. Josiah Nix. Revs. J. S. Bellman and A. Newbery, with local preachers and friends, together with a brass band and illuminated lantern, formed a procession through the streets every evening, and thus helped to stir the town. The noon prayer meetings were well attended, and the afternoon Bible readings were both popular and uplifting. All the shop assistants in the town were invited to an "At Home" and the spacious schoolroom was filled. Mr. Nix's impassioned pleadings resulted in 117 temperance pledges being taken and in the after service in the chapel several decided for Christ. The first Sunday afternoon service for young people was delightful. Some forty of the scholars entered the inquiry-rooms. On one occasion all the fishermen and boatmen with their wives were invited to a free tea. The schoolroom was crowded, and many rejoiced to see some fifty-seven men and women coming forward to sign the pledge, several of whom afterwards sought and found salvation. The "Merrie Meeting" announced for the same evening drew crowds of people to the chapel. The mission was a great blessing to the church and the town. Over 114 persons of various ages have been seekers of salvation, and more than 450 have signed the temperance pledge. F.

Dartford Baptist Chapel.

The nine days' mission (November 2-10) conducted by Messrs. William Olney and Spencer Johnson at the Baptist Chapel, Dartford, has been a time of great blessing and refreshment. The services during the whole time have been largely attended, and definite work for Christ has been done all through, with the result that nearly 100 cards, affirming decision for Christ, have been signed and sent in. The Sunday evening services have on both occasions been crowded gatherings to hear the glad good news of salvation through the precious blood proclaimed in unmistakable clearness by Mr. Olney, and with touching tenderness in song by Mr. Spencer Johnson. The men's afternoon meetings at the Martyrs' Memorial Hall on the first Sunday and at the Y.M.C.A. on the second Sunday were times not to be forgotten, the halls in both instances being filled with men who were deeply impressed by the presentation of God's unspeakable love.

The Bible readings, held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday afternoons were very fully attended, increasing as the days passed by. Those who were privileged to attend say that the addresses on "The Indwelling Christ," "The Holy Spirit," and "Holiness" were such as would long be remembered. The children's meetings, held from Monday till Friday evenings, and each Sunday afternoon, were also very well attended, many of the elder children deciding to follow Jesus.

Scarborough Primitive Methodist Chapel.

The week previous to the mission conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Albert Harrison, all the services were devoted to prayer, and cottage meetings were held in the district, to which those in the locality were invited. During the mission several open-air services were held at the pier at noonday. At the same hour a prayer-meeting was held at the chapel. The night services were preceded by large and effective processions. On the Saturday night a more varied meeting was held, when special singing was rendered by the choir, and short addresses were given by two of the Scarborough lifeboat crew and Mr. Harrison. Rev. T. Buttrick also took part. At half-past nine about 150 of the friends processioned the streets for an hour, and, returning to the chapel, a prayer meeting was held at which, as at every previous service, including a lecture, penitents found peace. The second Sunday was a high day. A consecration service concluded the morning's worship, a love-feast was held in the afternoon, and the large chapel was crowded to excess in the evening.

At the conclusion of the mission, Mr. Buttrick conducted a special meeting for the benefit of the converts, when it was found that over 120 names had been taken, a large proportion of whom responded to the roll call, and arrangements were made for those who had been unable to attend to be visited without delay. At this service several persons sought the Saviour, and in addition to the saving effect upon the unconverted of all ages, the church has received a mighty quickening. J. L. Hopwood.

Revival at Mansfield.

Revival blessing has come to the Wesleyan Methodist congregation at Sutton, Mansfield. On a recent Lord's Day morning the resident minister, Rev. Walter Platt, asked all who were willing to consecrate themselves fully to the work of the Lord to meet him in the chapel at three o'clock, when sixty assembled for prayer and consecration. They separated fully assured of a blessing in the evening. When Mr. Platt ascended the pulpit the chapel was packed with an excellent congregation. An earnest Gospel address led up to a loving invitation to any who were anxious about their souls to come out and enter the inquiry-room. Instantly a married woman, whose husband had been converted the previous week, rose in her pew, stepped over a form, and bravely marched down the aisle. Then followed such a manifestation of power as is rarely witnessed. One after another came down from a crowded gallery and out of packed pews in the body of the chapel to find their way into the vestries for prayer and counsel, and by the time the Benediction was pronounced 170 persons had passed through the inquiry-room, ninety of these being over fifty years of age.

The good work continued up till the Thursday night, when Mr. Platt had the joy of seeing a large number come out on the Lord's side, the total for the five nights amounting to 270. On the Friday a large number of the inquirers met in the chapel. The sight was memorable. Fully three-fourths of those present were young people. Four new junior society classes have been formed and two new leaders appointed for adult classes.

Mission to the Blind.

There are few classes more in need of the hope and comfort of the Gospel than the blind poor. Shut out from much that makes life joyous, dependent on the help and pity of others, who can wonder if these people should sometimes faint and grow utterly weary in the struggle of life? Realizing these facts, the Indigent Blind Visiting Society is again engaging in special efforts to reach them.

A series of mission services is being held in eleven centres of the Metropolis. Throughout the year, the blind superintendent, Mr. Mead, and his ten missionaries, also blind, are visiting the people in their homes; but annually, through the kindness of Miss Emery, who meets all expenses, evangelistic services are conducted and special efforts made to gather these sightless sufferers into the fold of God.

This year witnesses the sixth annual mission to the blind, and at least 4,000 blind and their guides are reached in this way. Each service is prefaced by a tea, and at the close every blind person receives a ticket for a sack of coal, and every guide a useful book. Neither does Miss Emery overlook the bedridden blind, many such receiving a coal ticket, or, if inmates of the workhouse, 1s. in lieu of coal.

It was a strangely pathetic sight which met one's gaze at the East London Tabernacle on Thursday week. Strong, burly men, decrepit old women, youths and girls, were led into the hall. From the timidity with which some picked their way, it was easy to see that they had not long lost their sight; while others seemed quite accustomed to the darkness. The address given by Rev. Edwin H. Ellis was attentively listened to, and as one watched the expression on those hundreds of upturned faces one realized how greatly they needed to open their hearts to the love of God. Many of them have found peace, and in quiet trustfulness are pressing upward; but many others have yet to learn the secret of happiness. It is the earnest hope and prayer of the workers that these annual meetings may bring home to such the Gospel claims, and cause the Light of Life to shine through the darkness and chase away the gloom.

Dr. Torrey's Farewell to Australia.

After concluding his mission in Victoria, Dr. Torrey, accompanied by Mr. Alexander, visited Tasmania, New South Wales, and New Zealand, and the blessing of God attended the preaching and singing.

Returning to Melbourne, prior to sailing for India, the evangelists bade farewell to Australia at a great meeting held in the Town Hall on October 6. By five o'clock in the afternoon an eager throng began to permeate the environments of the Town Hall. Wisely, the doors were opened early, and at a quarter-past six the Hall was packed. The great gathering was well and cheerfully employed, during the waiting interval, in the spirited singing of the popular "Alexander" songs, conspicuous among these being the Melbourne favourite, "That will be glory for me." The front seats on the platform were occupied by ministers and evangelistic workers representing all evangelical sections of the Church. Behind these was the Alexander choir, still displaying the enthusiasm and efficiency of the Simultaneous Mission. When Dr. Torrey appeared, a little before half-past seven, the immense audience rose en masse, and the appearance of Mr. Alexander was the signal for a shout of "Two-Timothy-two-fifteen." Dr. Torrey gave an effective address on the value of personal work in evangelism, and also spoke at an overflow meeting which filled Dr. Bevan's church. The Southern Cross, in an editorial comment, says:—

"As a living and concrete proof of the scale and power of the revival, the meetings were very remarkable; and yet, in a sense, they represent the smallest results of that revival. There is another aspect of them; less dramatic and picturesque, perhaps, but still more significant. It may be found in the many hundreds of new communicants kneeling at the Lord's table in scores of churches; in the hosts of new workers in every form of Christian service; in the new fire and faith present in much of the preaching of all the churches; in the quickened sense of kinship found in Christian men of every name. The revival has been one of the great days of God in the history of religion in Australia!"

Rev. J. Bennett Anderson has held a fruitful mission at Londonderry. Several have yielded themselves to Christ, including some fine lads and young men.

Rev. T. L. Johnson, the coloured evangelist, who was for twenty years a slave, has held an eight days' mission at Croydon in the London City Mission Hall. With pathos and fidelity he set forth the story of the Redeemer's love, drawing from his own experience as a slave as illustrating the bondage of sin.

A very encouraging nine days' mission has been conducted by Mr. Musa Bhai in Coverdale Chapel, Limehouse, E. Several of the young people entered the Kingdom, and the spiritual tone of the church has been raised, while outsiders have been brought into the sanctuary. The open-air meetings were very effective. R. D. Thomas, Pastor.

At St. George's Church, Kendal, a remarkable mission has just closed in connection with the Kendal Rural Deanery Mission. The missioners were Revs. G. Algernon West (vicar of St. Thomas', Sunderland) and J. B. Philps (curate of Monkwearmouth Parish Church, Sunderland). During the ten days forty-eight services were held, at most of which addresses were given. Vast congregations gathered night by night at the mission services. A deep and solemn religious atmosphere prevailed, and it was with intense eagerness that the people listened to the message of life. The strong personality of Mr. West, together with the deeply spiritual and intellectual treatment of his subjects, produced a powerful effect upon all classes. The mission has brought new life and consecration to a large number of individual lives and changed many homes.

Rev. A. Allan has paid a second visit to Kirkintilloch, this time in connection with a United mission, in which all the evangelical ministers were interested, and his fortnight's work has been successful in the best sense of the word. The attendances were large, many were brought to decision, and many more were helped and strengthened. His addresses were full of scriptural teaching and spiritual insight, and were delivered in a manner at once pleasing and persuasive.

A fifteen days' mission, conducted at the Primitive Methodist Church, Northwich, by Mr. Thomas Goudie, of the Evangelization Society, concluded on November 9. The services proved a blessing not only to the church, but to the town and district. Interest was but poor at first, but night after night there were decisions for Christ, and the attendances increased from about 150 to about 750. Many passed through the inquiry room, and, says the correspondent who forwards these particulars, "we hear of men getting converted while at work, and women while following their home duties."

Rev. Thos. Riley, of the North of Scotland Wesleyan Mission, has introduced a new feature of work—a six o'clock lantern service on the Sabbath. Of a recent meeting the Buchan Observer says:—"A crowded congregation testified to the public appreciation of this endeavour to draw in the outsiders, and the order and solemnity of the service could only have a beneficial result." Mr. Riley writes:—"The work of God is reviving along the shores of the Moray Firth. Last Sunday evening a glorious time was experienced in the service at Portessie, conducted by Rev. G. H. Ryves, the resident minister. A number stood up and declared their decision to serve the Lord. Christians were revived, and gave themselves afresh to the Lord Jesus Christ."

Patron—
HIS MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE KING.

Vice-Patrons—
Rear-Admiral H.R.H. The PRINCE OF WALES, K.G., the FOUR ARCHBISHOPS and the BISHOPS, &c.

INCREASED FUNDS are urgently NEEDED to meet the expenditure involved by the recent extensions of the operations of the Missions to Seamen to several ports abroad, where formerly the crews of British ships were destitute of religious ministrations.

In consequence of these valuable extensions in ports abroad it has become unhappily necessary to reduce the staff working afloat in home ports. Further funds are required to fill up the vacancies thus caused.

The Society maintains 194 Chaplains, Readers, Boatmen, &c., working amongst the shipping and fishing vessels in 74 seaports in every part of the world.

Sixty-nine Mission Steamers, Sailing Vessels and Boats, and 105 Seamen's Churches and Institutes, are in daily use, winter and summer.

Expenditure in 1901, £40,770 10s. 6d.

Annual Subscriptions, Donations, Offertories, Drawing-Room Meeting Collections, &c., should be sent to Commander W. Dawson, R.N.

The Battle for Bread. On p. 18 we place before our readers some facts gathered from workers among the very poor in our midst. The present distress is described as "appalling"—unusually so for early winter. The spirit sighs and the heart aches at such a painful recital, but sentiment must give place to very prompt and practical help—and plenty of it—for the honour of our City, and above all of our Christian profession and philanthropy. The cry of strong men, toiling women, and starving little children, comes up into our ears. May it send our hands deep into our pockets.

The Church and the City. We are glad to welcome a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Rowntree's book on 'Poverty: a study of Town Life" (Macmillan). Upon its first appearance we noticed it, and we hope that in this cheaper form it will find its way into the hands of all who sincerely pray, "Thy kingdom come." It is only by the careful examination of hard facts concerning the poverty and crime of our towns and cities, that the Christian conscience can be fully awakened to a sense of responsibility for the bettering of human life. It is unhappily true that many of the more respectable members of Christian churches know next to nothing of the terrible state in which thousands of their neighbours live. They avoid the slums and all unpleasant places; and, knowing nothing, of course, they feel nothing. Our Lord was moved with compassion for the multitude "when He saw." This is the only way in which true compassion can be excited. We must see and know what is wanting. Publication of facts such as those given by Mr. Rowntree, should help to awaken the whole Church to claim the cities for Christ.

The Spread of Luxury. Lady Violet Greville has given some unpleasantly plain reading in The Graphic upon the spread of luxury in all classes. She gives some instances—notably one of a lady who spent £1,400 upon a linen and lace tablecloth. Well may the writer regard these spendthrift habits as a bad omen for English solidity and good sense—the virtues we especially pride ourselves on—since these grand ways directly encourage shams and vanities which render people contemptible. And with want and poverty abounding on every hand, it becomes more serious still when persons give themselves over to senseless luxury. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus does not seem to be much read in these days, but it is a parable enacted, unhappily, each day of life.

The Food of the Poor. The Daily Express has set itself, with commendable determination, to expose the iniquity of the "ring" system in the sale of the people's food, particularly in the matter of fish. Despite the unparalleled catches of fish recently taken on the Eastern Coast, the price remains the same for the London market—prohibitive for very many of the very poor. Rather than break the prices fixed by the "ring," tons of good fish have been carted away for manure. Some millions of herrings might have been sold in the East End of London at three and four for a penny; but no, the people may starve rather than a commercial tradition be broken. The Express points out the folly of this, even from a commercial point of view, for the West-End shops might easily have the pick at the "ring" price, leaving the rest of the glut for cheap distribution amongst the poor. We are glad to see that some firms have taken the hint, and have been selling tons of good fish at 1d. per lb. which would otherwise have been thrown away.

The Look and the Touch. There is a lesson for all workers in the method adopted by our Lord in dealing with the deaf mute of Decapolis. If the unusual actions of Jesus on that occasion have puzzled commentators, they offer no puzzle to the heart. That look up to heaven, the sigh and the Divine touch of healing, are recorded for us as revealing a law in dealing with all hard cases. The appeal to Heaven is the first thing. It is at once a renunciation of all confidence in our own powers and a confession of full trust in Divine power and compassion. It were well if every effort to help men began in this way. The humanitarianism which omits heaven from its programme is doomed to failure in the last event, although it may succeed for the moment. The sigh follows the look. True compassion for men is secured from the first Source of all compassion. The man who looks up sincerely to God will soon begin to sigh for the miseries of men. Compassion is completed by action. The touch follows the sigh. The secret of all successful service lies in these few words of the Evangelist. Thousands begin at the wrong end—with the touch. If men, through us, are to be delivered and healed, we must begin with God—the appeal to and dependence upon Him. The rest will follow in its natural order.

The "Set Time" for Blessing. There is a "set time" for God's special working amongst men—of that there can be no doubt. History is emphatic upon this point. But it is a time that is largely influenced by the spirit and action of God's people. The principle is stated for us by the Psalmist:

> Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favour her, yea, the set time is come, for thy servants take pleasure in her stones and favour the dust thereof (Psa. cii. 13, 14).

An interested and awakened church is the signal for a special manifestation of God's power. It was so in the memorable revival of 1859, and again in 1873. We are hoping it will be so again, and that right early. There are several indications of deepening interest in God's work. We have referred already to the great missionary conferences which the Wesleyans are holding everywhere in this country, and which are wonderfully full of power and enthusiasm. News reaches us of a remarkable missionary awakening in America. At Cleveland, Ohio, 1,900 workers recently attended a four days' Convention—each State sending representatives. Upon one of the evenings, £75,000 (300,000dols.) was pledged in two hours for mission work. From Australia news of continuous blessing comes; that Colony has experienced a remarkable revival. All these things are the signs of a new movement of God. Are we ready to prepare for it, and appropriate it for ourselves?

"Through Committee." The much-debated Education Bill has at last passed the Committee stage, and it is clear that it will become law in substantially the form it has now taken. It is not too much to say that while it was well-meant, as a settlement of a vexed problem, it is acceptable to no party in the land. Intended to settle the question of religious strife, it has let loose the dogs of theological warfare, and will doubtless be the beginning of a long and bitter struggle between the two great forces of our religious world—Ecclesiasticism and Evangelical Protestantism. It is noteworthy that the Church Times, in an editorial note, openly and emphatically repudiates the latter phrase, "both the name and thing being totally unknown to the Church." The one benefit which the Bill has so far conferred upon the nation is to clear the air of misconceptions, and to demonstrate the impossibility of any fruitful compromise. It can only be hoped that in the great controversy before us, Protestants will stand to their guns with unconquerable conviction, but also with true-hearted charity.

Ministerial Breakdowns. The sudden death of Mr. Hugh Price Hughes, coming as it did at the end of a long and trying illness, the result of overwork, is another call to consider some methods which prevail amongst us to-day. Dr. Berry, Mr. Macgregor, and a number of others during the last decade have suddenly collapsed—victims of overwork—and now Mr. Hughes has gone. Several other prominent ministers are at present invalided, the cause being the same in each case. We do not believe the service of God is such slave-driving as to necessitate the premature death or disablement of men who can be ill-spared.

Who is to Blame? The fault is in our system of work. When men rush all over the country from meeting to meeting, spend their nights in travelling, and their days in hard, driving work, collapse is inevitable. Paul spoke of "itching ears." Popular men are often invited to speak simply because they are a "draw," and not so much for the spiritual benefit that may be derived from their words. This is a vice, and the death of some prominent workers is the price we have to pay for it. Another cause of these breakdowns is the unequal distribution of work. Too much is made to depend upon one man. If the Apostolic principle of all taking their part in the work of God prevailed, we should be able to keep our leaders for captains' work, instead of using them for all purposes, and so running the risk of losing them altogether.

Criticism and the Pulpit. In his address to the students of Cheshunt College, last week, Canon Hensley Henson offered some valuable suggestions upon the duty of the preacher towards his people in the light of modern criticism. It was a timely and necessary exhortation to young men to remember, not the likes of their congregations, but their needs, as also was the further exhortation to keep out of the pulpit critical discussions, and to declare only assured truths. This is a word in season to all who are bitten with novelties. But we cannot subscribe to Canon Henson's further remark that "criticism is a force making for Christian unity." In what way? We think there are many signs, on the contrary, that it is a force making for disintegration. If all that passes to-day for "criticism" is to be accepted as Gospel truth, the central binding force of all Christianity—the Redeemer Himself—is no longer secured to us. It is time that the students in our colleges were told that much of what is so loudly proclaimed as "criticism" is nothing more than a collection of private opinions, many of which are manifestly biassed.

The Old Truths. In an exhaustive paper which appears in The Homiletic Review on "The Place of the Bible in Twentieth Century Missions," Rev. Dr. Ellinwood, the secretary of the American Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, enforces the argument that no essential doctrines must be eliminated or watered down, and no change of emphasis made, to suit supposed changes in modern thought. He points out conclusively that there are no insuperable objections in the minds of Orientals to the doctrinal teachings of the New Testament, especially in regard to those as to vicarious redemption, future rewards and punishments, and, above all, the Resurrection, which latter, he says, "is not without counterparts in the range of Eastern thought, and is involved in the very prevalent belief in re-incarnation." Dr. Ellinwood sums up:—

It may be said, therefore, in a word, that the Christian Church, however shaken and dubious in regard to its doctrines here at home, need have no fear that they will be the occasion of any stumbling on the mission field. Except in those countries where, as in India and Japan, the East has been indoctrinated by Western types of infidelity, it will have no trouble with our Scriptures. Let the Bible stand in its integrity and its acknowledged power.

Dr. Chavasse on the Decadence. In his recent charge to the clergy of the diocese, the Bishop of Liverpool spoke very pessimistically of the spiritual condition of large masses of the people in that populous district. He deplored a large falling-off in Sunday-school attendance during the year, a reduction of no fewer than 154 teachers and 3,267 scholars, and a large decline in church attendance—the river, the golf ground, the tennis lawn, and the excursion offering attractions which proved the most potent. In the superhuman task of stemming and stopping this tide of decadence and falling away from God, Dr. Chavasse urged the clergy to begin with themselves, to see that the salt had not lost its savour; and he warned them that they might in the pressure of monotonous duties "become secularized without knowing it." He said, and the words have a bearing beyond the diocese of Liverpool:—

They must all turn back to the first vision, and start afresh, humbler and renewed men, and that vision was Christ. They must live among their people. They must go in and out of their houses. . . . Pastoral visitation begot confidence and mutual knowledge. Let them cut down their meetings. They wasted their time in countless meetings and addresses. Their preaching needed adapting. The people wanted sermons that appealed to heart, and head, and conscience, that came warm and living from the preacher's heart to theirs. Let them speak to them, whether rich or poor, as men and women with sins to be forgiven, with passions to be conquered, with temptations to be met, with death to be faced.

The Need of the Soul. In dealing with the subject of the criticising of sermons, a somewhat satirical writer has expressed some views worthy of careful thought on the part of those who are privileged to preach the Gospel. He says (after remarking that when children meet in the dining-room hungry they want dinner, not a lecture on albuminoids):—

I have heard preachers many a time say, and I agree with them, that in one way or in another every human being is saying, "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." Very well, then, take the existence of this thirst for granted, appeal to it, strengthen it, and offer the water of life. Let science and the Higher Criticism alone. . . . A preacher in the pulpit is a physician at the bedside, or certainly when dealing with patients. He is not a physician in the laboratory. We do not want theological chemistry, we want bread.

The Claim to Freedom. Rev. David Heath, in a series of lectures to the theological students at the Methodist New Connexion College at Sheffield, and recently published under the title "The Free Church Movement in England," has produced a volume likely to be of great use to those who wish to be familiar with the basis of great movements. At the present time it is very essential that those who feel themselves compelled to dissent from the State Church should be able clearly to define the grounds upon which their position is based, and, as a concise summary, perhaps few statements could be better than Mr. Heath's:—

The Free Church movement is a denial of the premiss that national religion is an affair of statecraft, or that personal religion is an affair of authority. The movement is based upon the positive declaration of the right of private judgment, consequent upon the doctrines of free grace, and the Holy Spirit, on the fact of the spiritual nature of religion, on the independence of religion of political control, on the lawfulness of free religious organization, and on the rightful claim of such free organizations to be in (i.e., they are already in) the Church of the living God, of which Jesus Christ is the only Head.

Bookstall Literature. In the new volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica Supplement, Mr. Augustine Birrell contributes a preface on "Modern Conditions of Literary Production," in which he makes some wise strictures on the kind of literature provided at railway bookstalls:—

The railway bookstall has, perhaps, played some part in education; if so, it has been but an obscure part, for except in the matter of newspapers and the most advertised novel of the moment, it cannot be said even to respect the average intelligence of the travelling public. A reformed railway bookstall is a dream of the future; but perhaps railways themselves may have become a dream of the past before this dream has even a chance of realization.

It is certainly no credit to the travelling public that while the bookstalls supply all the latest sporting news and "tips," all higher reading is conspicuous by its absence. There are few directions in which a more drastic reform is needed than in "general reading"—a smart phrase which covers a multitude of sins against not only good taste, but all the higher interests of the mind.

A Desirable Step. It is gratifying to find that the Lord Chamberlain and his Licenser of Stage Plays have apparently taken to heart the protests of the more thoughtful journals—The Christian among the number—in regard to the desecration of sacred things upon the modern stage. It has been announced that two compositions, one based upon Milton's Paradise Lost and the other named Bethlehem have been refused licences for London theatres on the ground that they are "concerned with Scripture characters." This desirable action comes a little late, it is true, but it points to a very acceptable improvement; and if the Lord Chamberlain will only go a little further in the direction of repressing immoral productions and performances, the office deputed to his Licenser would be considerably elevated in public opinion.

The Claim to Infallibility. The remarkable articles in the current numbers of the Quarterly Review and the Civilta Cattolica on the Roman Index afford a singular illustration of one of the futile methods by which Rome has endeavoured to prevent the development of thought, and spiritual and mental freedom. Scarcely a notable name in the list of those who have been foremost in the struggle for religious liberty is absent from this list of writers whose books are forbidden to "the faithful." The fact that from the new edition, recently published, of the Index Expurgatorius, over 3,000 names have been omitted, shows, however, that even the Popes and their advisers may err, and that their successors have been compelled to admit the fact. Not long ago a Florence newspaper asked which Pope was infallible, the one who burned the heterodox Savonarola, or the present Pontiff who has now authorized the publication of the martyr's sermons!

Female Wreckage. The measure of success which, happily, has attended the establishment of an Inebriate Females' Reformatory at Hookwood by the London County Council, is shadowed by the painful fact that more than one-half of the compulsory patients—fourteen out of twenty-six—are known to have returned to their old habits of intemperance. It is perhaps not difficult to see in what respect the curative system is defective, and it may be found that the period of protection from temptations to drink must necessarily be extended in most cases. Each inmate of this establishment costs the ratepayers about one pound per week, and although this side of the question is the lowest one, it may by-and-by strike the taxpayers that it would be decidedly cheaper to close the gin shop—the wholesale manufactory of drunkards—than to build reformatories when the harm has been done. As a recent visitor to the Home has said:—

Each woman stands for a disgraced life, perhaps for a blighted home, perhaps for broken hearts, and some will have passed on an hereditary curse to posterity.

Jerusalem Evangelistic Mission. Visitors to the Holy City have from time to time inquired for some Mission Hall of the free and open character familiar in our own land and America—a place of Christian communion, a centre of Gospel effort. Not only have visitors inquired for such a place of worship, but there are residents who would welcome workers along Evangelical and Evangelistic lines. There seems a likelihood that this need may now be met, under the auspices of the Foreign Mission Agency. Mr. Archibald Forder, who is prepared to go forth as organizer of the work, and as a missionary to the Bedouin, has written us an explanatory letter, which will appear in our next issue.

Heredity versus Environment.

By T. J. BARNARDO, F.R.C.S.Ed.

EVERY careful student of the conditions of life among the masses, who has really lived in the slum districts of our great cities, must have had confronting him at some time or other the apparently profound problems which arise out of the condition of the abject and degraded poor. We are forced at times to ask ourselves the question: Is there indeed a tendency, a bias, an influence in us, a "something not ourselves," which, as we grow, makes irresistibly for Righteousness or for Evil? And does this fateful influence operate more powerfully than force of circumstances, or present conditions of life? Truly a deeply interesting question, and one which goes to the root, as I think all will admit, of much of our effort as social reformers and Christian workers.

Are we really powerless, as many have taught, in the face of heredity? Are we in the grip of a bias or tendency, whether in the physical, mental, or moral nature, which imposes limits upon us, which we cannot ever pass or overcome? Is a child born in the slums, the prisoner of an influence that it knows not of, which will bend its character, and mould its will to evil or to good, in spite of all efforts to the contrary? If this be indeed true, it might almost be demonstrated that we, though human beings, are but automata, mere bits of machinery, in whom there would be no play left for freedom of will, and with whom responsibility is but an empty word. We might even go deeper still, and say that in such there would be no room even for the grace of God. What we call "conversion to God" of the whole man, spirit, soul, and body, would in such a case be clearly unthinkable.

"THE CITY'S WASTREL LIFE."

How often, when pacing common lodging-house districts at night, meeting men and women with the ingrained marks of degradation on face and form, accompanied by little children from whom all the grace and beauty of childhood have been driven, and who already looked as though in their very features they carried the dread strain of their evil ancestry—how often has one been overwhelmed with paralysing thoughts of the apparent hopelessness of one's task! For, after all, what were I and others doing, but endeavouring in vain to charm the deaf adder, piping in the market-place to those who could not and therefore would not dance, touching with idle fingers the mere fringes of the City's wastrel life? Was there any hope for this class, as a class? Must evil beget evil and conquer good, and prevail and spread itself? Ah, those who stay at home at ease, or who engage in academic discussions on the subject, and enjoy all the great privileges which come from Christian environment, can have no conception of the intense agony of mind with which such burning thoughts take possession of those who, like myself, have been for more than a generation, among the lapsed masses.

NOT THEORIZERS, BUT PRACTICAL WORKERS

After a while, my attitude in response was something like this—to close my eyes and ears to everything except duty; to "do the next thing," to help this one or that one, these or those, just as they came to me, and to leave the rest; for one's mind shrank from dwelling upon the subject as a whole. But gradually the great and comforting truth pressed its way home, "God hath not left Himself without a witness." The children are only in the grip of overwhelming, all-conquering forces IF the Church of God neglects them. But if we arise and do our duty manfully, as Christ would have us do it, with His love in our hearts, His tears in our eyes, His warmth and His strength in our outstretched hands and arms, the victory is ours, or, rather, let me reverently say, is His. These conclusions, when they were arrived at, braced one to manlier and more insistent service, in season and out of season. But I am anticipating somewhat.

I must here explain that the peculiar experience I acquired in the work which God has given me to do led me to very definite conclusions, as the result of observations continued over thirty-six years. I am constantly being inquired of upon this subject, and cannot always find time to commit to paper such explicit communications as my correspondents would desire.

Let me, therefore, set forth briefly some of my conclusions here. I am no doctrinaire; hence it is that I prefer to employ the experimental method in giving replies to the inquiries which the subject arouses. Let me, therefore, say at once that I am strongly of opinion, from an observation of thousands of instances, that there is no inherent tendency in any boy or girl, no matter how descended, or how surrounded, which may not be eradicated, or at least subjugated, under favourable conditions. In other words, in the fierce contest between Heredity and Environment I firmly believe that, all other things being equal, Environment is the more potent force of the two. This is distinctly as such I utter it for the comfort of others, even as it has given me inexpressible encouragement. I, of course, am chiefly referring to the mental, moral, and spiritual nature—in short, to the character; but all that has been indicated long before by the facts of science as they bear upon the material or physical nature. "We rule by obeying nature," wrote Lord Bacon long ago, and it turns out that in the physical realm nature will second our efforts to a remarkable, almost a miraculous degree in dealing with hereditary tendency.

Diseases which once upon a time we thought to be all-powerful and incurable, are now known to be amenable to treatment. That tuberculosis itself is curable is the latest contention of medical science; diphtheria has been robbed of nearly all its terrors; the operation for appendicitis would never have been thought of thirty years ago, and who shall say that we are not now on the verge of checking the onward progress of that terrible scourge, cancer? But what is true in the physical realm is, I am convinced, equally true in the moral and spiritual realms; and that is the thought which should breathe the very spirit of hope and cheerfulness into the depressed and discouraged worker among the overcrowded masses living in our slum districts.

No one is hopelessly handicapped by his birth conditions. That is the splendid outcome of proved experience. No one is bound down by an iron chain of evolution which will drag him, willy-nilly, into the abyss. "I bid you be of good cheer" is the message which, at least from my particular corner, I call out to my brethren working in the slums, and I doubt not that what I humbly declare on this subject will be corroborated by fellow-workers and observers far and near.

What hath God wrought, for instance, among the 47,000 children which have passed through my hands, over 6,000 of whom are under my care to-day? Among these I have little ones who have been drawn from the vilest human antecedents that it is possible to conceive. Their ancestry runs through records of vice and degradation, of lust and laziness, of drink and crime, back and back and back for generations, till one would think that the very life-blood in them was polluted. And yet experience has proved over and over again that if we will take these unfortunates, whom we might call secure them early enough, lift them up out of their present surroundings, place them in a pure, favourable and healthy environment, let them grow up among Christian influences, keep them sufficiently long under all these favourable circumstances—their lives will yet run themselves clean and sweet, and the result will be men or women such as one would hardly imagine possible, if one regarded only their antecedent history. Nor would I like to lay down any limits to this particular doctrine. I have never yet seen the end of it; for, remember, we are handicapped terribly in all our efforts, and have seldom had a chance of a perfectly virgin experiment.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF ENVIRONMENT.

Such a child as I have described usually comes under my care, not merely with this hereditary bias or tendency, but already smirched with the brands of actual sin and shame; the memory already fouled with evil thoughts and evil sights and evil sounds; so that we have not to deal with the tendency merely, but with a life already marked with sin, with a tendency that has already been permitted to affect the child's habits and character, and which has been strengthened by the evil surroundings or environment which was perhaps the only atmosphere the child has breathed from infancy. How very seldom, even for the purpose of experiment, is it that we can secure a case in which a child of evil parentage and evil ancestry, carried back to two or three generations, is rescued so young as to be uncontaminated by actual vice? If we who are doing this work had only the hereditary tendency to deal with, that would be a force more easily overcome; for I do not believe (and I write these words deliberately as the result of thirty-six years' careful study and observation), that there is a single known instance in which such a little child might not, if rescued young enough, be bred up honest and pure and manly, or womanly, and good.

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE ESSENTIAL.

But my readers must always bear in mind that this result is only attainable in those cases where the powerful element in the environment of the child is a real religious influence—a deeply sincere, personal piety, arising out of a loving faith in God Himself.

Moreover, in all such instances, very careful precautions must be taken. As regards young children who are the offspring of thieves or degraded women, and who have sprung from a line of vicious descent, I lay down this as a sine qua non, that they must be removed at the very earliest age from their evil associations, that they be lifted right out of their bad environment, and placed under active influences the very reverse of all they were subjected to, and that the new environment be continued until certain well-known crises in the individual life are safely passed.

It goes without saying that these influences must be healthy alike for mind and body, accompanied by good food, fresh air, moral surroundings, and a sweet, wholesome example, to which has to be added that which, as I have already indicated, I have ever found by practical experience to be the most powerful of all in influencing children of a degraded type, viz., personal religion of a thoroughly earnest, sincere, and deeply real character; prayerful habits, and above all the inculcation of a deep belief in God, in His power and all-presence and love; while a deep consciousness is instilled of the love and personality of the Saviour, and of the Divine character of God's Word as His message to every human soul. These are the factors, which above all others, have had, in my experience, the greatest influence over children who would otherwise never have been able in the struggle to overcome the tendency or bias, the hereditary strain, with which they were handicapped on entering life; for remember that all along it is, and must ever be, a struggle, a real fight. If heredity is conquerable, as I firmly believe it to be, it is only as the outcome of a fiercely waged contest, and such contests leave abiding traces.

"The amount of grace," said the late Henry Ward Beecher on one occasion, "that would make John into a saint would hardly suffice to preserve Peter from knocking a man down!" Some cases need an infinity of help, as compared with others. Wherever heredity is the burden of a young life, we can strengthen the moral fibre, but we can never preserve the individual from a considerable struggle.

It must not be supposed that all the cases of success to which I have referred, eventuated in true conversion to God. That is not so. Let no one imagine for a moment that, because Christian teaching and Christian example may not have resulted in some particular case in the conversion of the individual, therefore it was futile. I have before my mind now many instances in which the benign, overcoming influence of Christian example and teaching was powerfully felt in strengthening the moral fibre, in awakening and enlightening Conscience, and in giving the individual power to overcome evil tendencies, even when there had been no such brilliant illumination of the inner man which we call "Conversion."

The great point I would press upon all engaged in work like ours is, that even in the worst cases that have come under my observation, it is in the power of Christian Environment to neutralize the apparently fateful influence of Heredity, so that we are constantly called upon to give God thanks, in that He always makes us to triumph in Christ Jesus.

"Launch Out Into the Deep!"

(Luke v. 4.)

Launch out!
Yet, whither goes my feeble barque,
O'er storm-swept life, in light, in dark,
How shall I 'scape the treacherous rock
When subtle eddies drive and mock?
Yet, must I—Launch out!

Launch out!
Shall Satan's voice my footsteps stay,
Or fears compel the least delay?
His voice it is, that gives command,
He sets my course for the "Better Land."
Thus, do I—Launch out!

Launch out!
What if my fellows stay behind,
Though dear ones, yet, are "deaf" or "blind,"
Into the deep with Him I go,
Kept by a Power I love and know,
So, will I—Launch out! C. S. Broadbent.

The Outpoured Spirit.—6.

THE FAITH WHICH SECURES THE GIFT.

THE faith which justifies the believer and secures the gift of the Holy Ghost is faith in God who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was delivered to death for the offences, and raised again for the justification, of us, who by Him do believe in God, that raised Him from the dead and gave Him glory, that our faith and hope might be in God (Rom. iv., v.; 1 Pet. i.).

It is in the nature of things impossible thus to believe in God and not to receive His Spirit, as in the nature of things it was impossible for our first parents in the garden to believe the serpent's malignant slander of God and not receive the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. No creature can thus commit itself to the Creator or to another creature without drinking in the spirit of the one so trusted, whether for good or evil.

THE TWELVE DISCIPLES AT EPHESUS.

Can the Holy Spirit be received apart from faith in the glorified Christ? and will He ever be withheld from those who believe and obey the Gospel, which, in its briefest form, is "Jesus and the Resurrection"?

A typical and representative case (as were those of the Samaritans and the Gentiles) afforded the Apostle Paul, in the providence of God, the opportunity for the solution of this double question. More than twenty years after Pentecost, Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew, well instructed in the Old Testament Scriptures, and eloquent in the expression of his views, which embraced a knowledge and acceptance of John the Baptist's teachings, came to Ephesus. There he taught and exhorted to confession of sin, repentance toward God, and trust in a Greater than John—One who should baptize in the Holy Ghost, as John baptized in water. Apollos presumably baptized as disciples those who accepted his testimony. Aquila and Priscilla took him and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. Then he left for Achaia.

Paul came to Ephesus while Apollos was at Corinth, and found twelve disciples.* The mention of the fact that it was while Apollos was at Corinth that Paul came to Ephesus, seems intended to connect Apollos with the twelve disciples whom Paul found there. Nothing was more natural than that Paul, having learned from his friends, Aquila and Priscilla, the character of Apollos' teaching and its results, should seek out those disciples who had received his teaching, and discover for himself and make evident to them, by one test question, whether they had received the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.

"Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?" or, "Having believed, did ye receive the Holy Ghost?"

They replied, "We did not so much as hear whether the Holy Ghost was [given], or, be yet given." (I venture to suggest that the word supplied should be not "given," but "outpoured," as the reference evidently is to the promise in Joel and Isaiah.)

"Into what, then, were ye baptized?"

"Into John's baptism." That is to say, they had confessed and repented of their sins, and had believed John's testimony to One greater than himself, who should baptize in the Holy Ghost. Moreover, their answer in the words of John vii. 39 would seem to imply that they were aware that the outpouring of the Holy Ghost depended on Jesus being glorified. But they had not heard that this had taken place.

The Apostle, then, we may be assured, preached unto them "Jesus and the Resurrection," and they were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus. And, Paul having laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues and prophesied.

WAS IT NOT TOO LATE?

Supposing that Samaritans and Gentiles could have received the promised Spirit, had not the day passed, the fiftieth day from the Resurrection, on which the promise was to be fulfilled?

The principle which supplies an answer to this question is found in Numbers ix. 6-11. Certain men, being unclean, were not able to observe the Feast of the Passover at the appointed time, the fourteenth day of the first month. Moses inquired the will of the Lord concerning them, and He who has declared that the letter killeth, but the Spirit quickeneth, provided a way out of the difficulty by permitting them to keep the Passover on the fourteenth day of the second month.

Acting on the same principle, the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit was represented in these three cases, at Samaria, at Cesarea, and at Ephesus, in order to supply an answer to each of the vital questions: Can those who repent and believe among the hated Samaritans and the despised Gentiles receive the promise of the Father equally with those of the chosen nation, who are the vineyard of the Lord of hosts and His pleasant plant? Peter had been prepared by his vision at Joppa, and his visit to Cesarea, to answer the question by another. "The Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning. . . . what was I that I could withstand God?" The exclamation of the assembled brethren, "Then hath God to the Gentiles also granted repentance unto life!" is demonstrative evidence that repentance unto life is equivalent to receiving the Holy Ghost; that the one cannot exist without the other. M.

* By a strange oversight of the significance of the case, the translators of the Twentieth Century New Testament have interpolated the words "of Christ," and made the question of the Apostle to have been, "When ye became disciples of Christ, did ye receive the Holy Ghost?" But his inquiry elicited the fact that they were not as yet disciples of Christ, of whose death and resurrection, and of the outpouring of the Spirit, they had not heard. Had they been baptized as believers in Christ, Paul would not have repeated the ordinance.

Night Cabmen in London.—The forty-first annual report of the Mission to the Night Cabmen of London says: "We are cheered to find that many of the men, who at one time took no interest in spiritual things, are now serving God, and are anxious for their fellows. We find that the constant visitation is not lost, and that the prayers of God's servants are not forgotten. Several more have begun to attend a place of worship." A copy of the new report will be sent post free to any name and address by Miss Hebert, Ellerslie, Byron Hill, Harrow. The two missionaries are appointed by the London City Mission.

Municipal Lodging-Houses.—The London County Council certainly have taken a step in the right direction in arranging for the clearing of insanitary areas in Southwark, and for the erection thereon of a women's lodging-house, with bedrooms for fifty-seven women and girls, and a dining and sitting room at moderate nightly charges. The committee state that, after the heavy cost of preparing the site and providing the building, it is quite impossible that so small an establishment should be self-supporting, but the experiment must be considered from a higher standpoint than mere pecuniary profit. Those who are familiar with the circumstances and conditions of women toilers in London and other large cities, know how pressingly such accommodation is required not only by reason of the wide dis-housing of the poor, but in the interests of morality and religion. As the necessary addition to the rates is almost microscopic, and as the gain will be more than commensurate, it is to be hoped that the new building will be only the first of a number designed to bring a little comfort into the lives of a large section of industrious and deserving people.

Hugh Price Hughes.

By Rev. J. GUINNESS ROGERS, D.D.

THE sudden removal of Hugh Price Hughes is to me a personal bereavement, which it is not easy at the moment rightly to estimate. His death was all the more distressing because it was so unexpected. I had not seen him since the great Education demonstration at St. James' Hall in the early summer. There was nothing in his appearance or manner then to suggest the idea that the end was near. He was warm and affectionate, cheery, and bright, ready to joke with me on my "moderation," full of zeal and fervour; and though his speech seemed to exhaust him, there was nothing to forbid the hope that he might have years of work before him. So it has not pleased the Master. He has called him in an hour when we looked not for Him. Our brother rests, and stands in his lot at the end of the days. To us is the sense of loss and sorrow.

> But if we are left in darkness,
> He is somewhere in the light.

One of my earliest recollections of my departed friend is in connection with a meeting at Exeter Hall. Lord Shaftesbury was in the chair—Mr. Hughes and I were the speakers. I cannot easily forget the excitement and distress of the venerable old earl. My friend was broaching some of his broad views, which were regarded as much broader then than they would be to-day, and he greatly distressed the noble old man who, with all his religious and philanthropic enthusiasm, was a decided patrician in temperament, and very much of a Conservative in political feeling. My rôle was that of a mediator, and I did my utmost to soothe the sensitive feelings of the chairman. I am not sure that I did not sympathise more with him than with the speaker. At all events, I felt that his susceptibilities must be respected, and the meeting, if possible, be saved from the unpleasantness of a collision.

That was accomplished, but the incident was a revelation of the true Price Hughes which has since been abundantly confirmed by innumerable circumstances. I admired then his frankness, the breadth and generosity of his sympathies, the boldness of his thinking, and the eloquence of his speech. Here, clearly, was a man who was not hide-bound by conventionalism, and yet did not rush to the opposite extreme of indifference to the feelings of others and contempt for ordinary courtesy. He went somewhat further than I should have been prepared to do. But the last thought in his mind was that of disturbing the aged chairman, for whom, in common with earnest Evangelical Christians of all churches, he had a profound respect, approaching even to veneration.

But no feeling for an individual, however strong it might be, could induce him to falter in his courageous service to a truth by which he was possessed. He felt strongly, and he spoke strongly, whether in word of compliment or of censure. But in either case he was

TRUE TO HIS OWN DEEP CONVICTIONS.

I felt this at the time of which I am speaking, and still more strongly in all my subsequent intercourse with him. As might be expected, we were often ranged in opposition to each other. But this did not disturb the friendliness of our intercourse, and it certainly did not lessen my esteem for him; for I was always satisfied of his absolute loyalty to conscience, and to me he was a specially interesting study because of our very differences.

We frequently started from the same fundamental principle, and yet, owing possibly to diversity of temperament or to the baffling influence of cross currents of thought on other subjects, found ourselves in strong opposition as to some practical issues. He as a convinced Wesleyan was, as might be expected, strongly influenced by the corporate sentiment, while I was an Independent of Independents.

Strange to say, however, he was just as pronounced an individualist as I could be, while I felt the value of an organization which did not usurp undue authority quite as strongly as he did. So far, however, as our private relations were concerned, it was the personal magnetism of the man of which I was most conscious. He was doubtless impetuous, fervid on behalf of any cause which he espoused with an intensity which at times made him seem to be imperious. But the strength of faith which expressed itself, even in the use of those superlatives which might provoke a smile, but which in truth revealed the passionate force of his nature, was at once attractive and impressive.

In a word, Price Hughes was an enthusiast, and an enthusiast of very deep dye. But his enthusiasm was softened, mellowed, and elevated, by other qualities which saved it from ever becoming harsh or austere. His fine bonhomie itself gave a brighter character to his more controversial work, so that even when he preached the Gospel of the Anti to an extent to which one could not always follow him, he did it in a very different style from that adopted by many other apostles of the school. Mr. G. J. Holyoake, in a very appreciative letter to the Daily News, says, "I admired Mr. Hughes' strong thinking, his spontaneity of speech, which was never weak; but I honour his memory for his efforts to render Christianity ethical."

There are some who contrive in pursuing this end to obscure Christianity itself. It was Mr. Hughes' distinction that he was as loyal to the supernatural side of religion as to that practical teaching to which some confine themselves; and that in the distinctive doctrines of the Gospel he found the inspiration and force of the high ethical standard which he ever commended and illustrated. To me nothing is more curious, and at the same time more sad, than the way in which some who greatly admire ministers of the Gospel who throw themselves heartily into the great reforming and benevolent work of the world, and even regard them as leaders, fail to understand that the force which shapes their character, inspires their service, and assigns them their place in the world's conflict, is

FAITH IN THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

It is possible that Christian teachers in former generations may have been too slow to grasp the full meaning of the teaching of James, that "faith without works is dead," and that "pure religion and undefiled before God the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." There is a possibility, indeed something more than a possibility, lest to-day the purely spiritual side of this teaching should be forgotten.

Mr. Price Hughes never failed to present the two in living union. He was a devoted preacher of the Gospel of Jesus Christ in its simplicity, in its exclusive claims, in its supremacy, and in its renewing power. He had a courage which quailed before no danger, a bright optimism which never despaired of success in the cause of righteousness, and withal a true disinterestedness which made him ever ready to sacrifice himself on the shrine of duty. Of course, he made many mistakes; in other words, he was human. Still, even in these mistakes, his enemies never found anything unworthy of his high character. And with them all, he was a great force for righteousness in his day and generation.

He was always quick to appreciate any act of brotherly affection, tender-hearted as a woman, and chivalrous as a Paladin. And the great formative influence in the whole was the grace of God. He believed in God as revealed in Christ, and he regarded the service of humanity as the highest service he could render to Him who loved him and gave Himself for him.

Welcome Mission, Portsmouth.—Mrs. Penn-Lewis gave four Bible-readings last week, three of which centred round the Cross of Christ and Paul's determination to know nothing save Christ crucified. She protested that to-day there is a general revolt against the Cross, and it is absolutely necessary to know its meaning. Not only does the believer obtain peace through the blood of the Cross, but it is the continual way of deliverance from sin, self, and the world. With Christ the believer has been crucified to the world and the world to him, and from the Cross there is a continual outflow of sacrifice to reach and save a dying world. Many were greatly helped. Mr. Hogben presided at the meetings.

Evangelists in Conference.

THE Conference of Evangelists held at the Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Wednesday of last week was fraught with encouragement to the large number of workers who assembled.

By a happy arrangement, the usual Noon Meeting was devoted to an address on the Evangelist and his Ministry. This was given by Sir Robert Anderson, who spoke on the first few verses of 2 Cor. vi., pointing out that (1) an evangelist called of God to the ministry of the Gospel must give no occasion of stumbling, for his standard is not that of the city or the police-court, but of God's Word. "During my stay at Scotland Yard, I had occasionally to send officers away to foreign parts on business. In such cases I would say to them; 'You are not now merely one of fifteen thousand men; you are Mr. Blank, of Scotland Yard, with the reputation of Scotland Yard to uphold.'" We are to bring no reproach on the truth. (2) There must be no levity on the part of an ambassador of Christ. We are to be "fools for Christ's sake"? Yes, but God has no pleasure in human folly. You evangelists might be doing well for yourselves from a worldly point of view; but you deny yourselves and follow the Lord. This is the folly, that you have sold all to buy the hidden treasure. But you are not to forget the dignity of the ministry entrusted to you. (3) The evangelist is not responsible for results; they must be left to God.

THE EVANGELIST AS PREACHER.

The Conference subsequently met under the presidency of Mr. G. E. Morgan, the first topic for consideration being "Preaching." The chairman, briefly introducing the subject, read Isaiah vi. 1-8, and dealt with the evangelist and his work, which must be the outcome, as in the cases of Isaiah and Paul, of obedience to "the heavenly vision."

Pastor Maycock, of Kensal Rise Tabernacle, pointed to preaching as of Divine institution. Its issues are immense, and therefore care in preparation for it is essential. "Scamping" in preparing means failure, and the shirking of the intellectual work involved is a sin. To prepare effectively, one must be filled with the Spirit. God is no patronizer of idleness, and while relying on one's trains of thought and illustrations, there must also be industrious effort to attain absolute clearness of expression. To this end, it is well to write much in private, and so gain lucidity and compactness. (2) There must be a vision of the subject. It should weigh upon the soul as a burden of the Lord; and thus be preached with a realization of the fact that it is God's message.

An interesting discussion followed. Mr. Ned Wright emphasized the value of preaching that is the natural outcome of a knowledge of the Bible and a love for souls. Mr. W. R. Lane dwelt on the need to use every means of preparation. Training the voice, for example, is of high importance, and as to writing out one's points, Bacon said, "Writing makes an exact man." Attention must also be given to reading and prayer. The man who, with time on his hands, fails here, deteriorates, in spite even of Bible knowledge. Mr. J. E. Taylor spoke on the same lines. "My soul burns with joy and gladness when I devote myself to the study of the Word. If I do not each day get something fresh from the Bible, I feel that day to be wasted. And, as 'chewing the cud' is to eating the grass, so is meditation to reading."

Any confidence in excellency of speech, apart from the Spirit's power, was deprecated by Mr. Henry Varley, who recalled that Mr. C. H. Spurgeon once said to him, "When I stand on that platform, I tremble." Oh for the breath of God upon our words!

The effectiveness of Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost was the subject of a telling word from Lord Radstock. "In an address that took but a few minutes to deliver, the Jewish system was shaken, and the Church founded by an unlearned man who, but a short time before, was a blasphemer. What caused this transformation? It was the Power that came from God.

PRAYER AND PREACHING.

Prayer in relation to preaching, the topic considered during the second hour of the Conference, was pointedly dealt with by Mr. J. S. Harrison, who read Ezekiel xxxvii. 1-10, and showed that both prayer and preaching are there set forth. Ezekiel, carried out in the Spirit of the Lord, had for his sphere a valley of death. He had to prophecy to dry bones—here we have the "foolishness of preaching," an entirely different thing from foolish preaching. It was God who was to do the work. "Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you." Then comes the end of preaching: "Ye shall know that I am the Lord." Sometimes when God works there is "a great noise"—sometimes not. He is Sovereign. In verse 9 we are led to the thought of prayer, and is not the lack of prayer the weakness of the evangelist's ministry to-day? The effect in the vision was miraculous: "They lived," and by prayer and preaching in the power of God, we, too, shall see dead souls raised to newness of life.

MISSIONS AND CONVERTS.

In the course of discussion Mr. Leonard Weaver said that people will work, visit, and distribute invitations in preparation for a mission, but they are backward in prayer. Mr. Weaver went on to advocate the prolongation of missions in order to give the evangelist time to encourage and build up the converts, and spoke briefly on four points: (1) There must be "a real grip" of the fact that God wants to save; (2) He has made perfect provision for salvation in His Son; (3) We have a right to expect blessing; (4) If we do not see results, we must go to God in prayer to seek out the reason.

Mr. Charles Cook, speaking on Isa. lv. 11, said that "the word" is the God-given message for the particular occasion; and Mr. W. R. Lane, referring to a suggestion that all-nights of prayer should be more frequently held, said that such gatherings must be, not merely a matter of duty, but the outcome of the prayer of the individual. We must live in the spirit of prayer.

The final word on the subject was from Mr. Varley, on "The Closed-in Place," and "The Open Reward" (Matt. vi. 6).

DOCTRINE.

Mr. Lane opened the third session. He said that (1) although there was never a time when the Bible was so much written about as to-day, the Bible itself is little known. (2) Addresses must be saturated with sound doctrine, and not be simply strings of anecdotes, although these have a place by way of illustration.

Sir Robert Anderson pointed out that while the evangelist must speak with simplicity, it must be the simplicity of a man thoroughly versed in the Word of God. The speaker also showed the necessity for intimate knowledge of dispensational truth.

The last speaker, Rev. John Tuckwell, said that the evangelistic successes of the early Methodists were largely due to the fact that they took great doctrinal subjects. Evangelists will do well to speak more frequently on the great themes that go to the very root of man's being, such as the Existence of God, the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, or the Resurrection.

So concluded a Conference which for utility and stimulus will long remain a grateful memory with those privileged to be present.

A Practical Experiment, capable of very general imitation, was attempted with success last summer on Hampstead Heath, by what was known as the Lyndhurst Refreshment Tent. Perceiving the importance of meeting the needs of holiday-makers in a wholesome way, the Temperance Committee of Dr. Horton's church provided a refreshment tent, where tea, coffee, sandwiches, &c., were sold at popular prices. The tent proved highly acceptable, and many were the expressions of gratitude heard, not only for the privilege of obtaining cheap and good food, but also for the kind and sympathetic words spoken. The experiment was tried on two Bank Holidays, and was even more widely appreciated on the second than on the former occasion. A band of workers was engaged each day distributing Gospel portions, tracts, &c., in the neighbourhood of the tent.

White Slave Traffic.

AN important stage in the history of the movement for the suppression of the White Slave Traffic was marked by a conference held, under the auspices of the National Vigilance Association, at the Holborn Restaurant last Thursday afternoon. Efforts extending over nearly four years have resulted in the establishment on a firm foundation of an international organization.

As chairman, the Bishop of Rochester expressed the deep gratitude of the members of the British committee for a measure of success in diplomatic correspondence which exceeded all expectations. The greatest importance was attached to the official Paris conference on the subject, when sixteen Governments had been represented by thirty-six plenipotentiary delegates. The authorities in these countries will, as soon as the conclusions of the conference can be ratified, be committed, among other things (1) To the appointment of officials specially charged to watch at railway stations and ports for persons engaged in the international traffic; (2) To question known prostitutes of foreign origin as to the steps by which they were induced to leave home, such information to be transmitted with a view to bringing the guilty parties to justice; (3) To exercise a surveillance over offices or agencies professing to find situations for women and girls. An augury of the most hopeful character was drawn from the fact that the delegates had refrained from any expression to show that their findings represented a maximum amount of restriction, leaving rather the impression that they were only feeling their way to see how much more could be done.

In an interesting statement, Mr. Percy Bunting called attention to the taking for granted by the delegates that the age of consent should be that of civil status, which in this country would at once raise it to twenty-one; and this step had already been taken in Russia, while France never legally recognized any other age. Comparing the juridical systems of the Teutonic and Latin races, it was shown that generally the former regard this traffic as criminal where there is no willing victim, whereas with the Latin peoples it is not regarded as a crime to persuade an adult woman to lead a vicious life. After serious discussion the Teutonic view has been officially pressed upon the other nations.

After referring to the excellent understanding between workers reached at the Frankfort Congress, October 7-10, Mr. W. A. Coote proceeded to indicate the forward steps which might now be taken. It was agreed (1) to appoint a British National Committee from the twenty-three organizations represented in the meeting—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish; and (2) to arrange for a deputation to the Home Secretary asking that this Committee shall be regarded as the medium of communication with the Government, in addition to being the depository of, and solely responsible for, all information submitted to the authorities.

Littlehampton Convention.

THE meetings held in Rev. W. Darlow Sarjeant's Home of Rest were interesting in several distinctive features. Throughout the convention visitors meet under one roof, share a common table, and often find in mutual fellowship more blessing and edification than in formal meetings, by whomsoever addressed.

The missionary field was represented by Mr. Forder, from Arabia; Mr. and Mrs. Gardner, of the Ceylon and General Indian Mission; Mr. John Lampard, from the Gonds of Central India; Mrs. Parker, from Finland; and Miss Panagiotides from Crete; while Mrs. Brewster and Mr. H. W. Fry, reported visits to the mission field.

The themes were the Cross of Christ, the risen, enthroned Prince of Life, the ministry of the Holy Ghost, the Coming Revival. Miss Bessie Porter, Mrs. Penn-Lewis, Rev. Arthur Champion (Rector of Horne), Rev. F. Paynter, and others, addressed the meetings. W. W. S.

Dr. Torrey in India.

FOR the past few months some of the missionaries and Christian workers of Madras have been praying earnestly for an outpouring of God's Spirit upon this city, upon India, and upon all flesh. Quite recently a little band met for prayer, and continued until after midnight in earnest supplication. Shortly after that a prayer-meeting, attended by representatives of nearly all the Protestant denominations, was held. It began at eight o'clock in the morning, and with two intermissions continued until six o'clock in the evening.

The hearts of those assembled on that occasion were gladdened by the unexpected news that Dr. R. A. Torrey, superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, whose labours within the last few months in Japan, China, and Australasia were so abundantly blessed of God, would spend a few days in Madras. He was urged to come here by Miss M. B. Hill, secretary of the Y.W.C.A., who had been a pupil in his Bible Institute.

Dr. Torrey's first meeting was held at Memorial Hall on Tuesday evening, October 28. Mr. Charles Alexander, who accompanies him in his missionary tour, led the singing, and Mr. Harkness played the piano. The first twenty minutes of the meeting were devoted to singing. It was evident at this first meeting that both Mr. Alexander and Mr. Harkness are masters of their calling; that Dr. Torrey, to a very eminent degree, studies to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, and that he and his assistants carry with them the atmosphere of heaven.

At nine o'clock that same evening a reception was held in the rooms of the Y.W.C.A., Rundall's Road. Most of us had read of their wonderful work in Australia, when at times 10,000 people had clamoured for entrance into a public hall, and that 8,500 converts had been invited to attend a praise meeting; and we expected Dr. Torrey to tell of that wonderful work, but instead, we were astonished to hear him give an account of what seemed to some of us a yet more wonderful work in Japan and China; not, indeed, as to numbers, but in its power to reach educated Japanese and Chinese, men and women, and lead them to own Christ as their Saviour.

It was Dr. Torrey's intention to stay only three days in Madras, but a committee of missionaries urged him to remain over Sunday. The people came in ever-increasing numbers, and the final meetings were held in the largest halls in the city. Nearly 100 professed to receive Christ as their Saviour. But many more received a new impetus in their Christian life.

It was believed by many that if these men of God had remained a few weeks, Madras would have been shaken. During even this short stay the non-Christian student population was profoundly stirred.

One fact was made evident, and to a most unusual degree, that a revival is brought about not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of God. And so there is every reason to believe that this work so gloriously begun will go on yet more gloriously. A. W. Rudisill.

Madras, November 6, 1902.

Rev. K. R. Gopalah Aiyar, of the M.E. Mission, Kodambakam, Madras, also writes of Dr. Torrey's evangelistic meetings. In the course of an interesting letter he says:—"Evangelistic services were held in the Memorial Hall for five evenings. The building, which accommodates nearly 700 people, was packed evening after evening by crowds of European, Eurasian, and native Christians, and a large number of Hindus and Mohammedans. The entrances of the hall and the windows were also crowded, so much so that more than a thousand people heard the Word of God daily. On three afternoons Dr. Torrey delivered addresses to educated Hindus, and the result of these has been the conversion of nearly 500 persons. Many non-Christians became the avowed disciples of our Lord."

Other Lands.

A Fortnight in Burma.—1.

As we approach the third city in the empire, next to Calcutta, the most important in commerce, and the largest rice port in the world, we are struck by the immense dimensions of the Shwe Dagon Pagoda, the largest and most magnificent of its kind, as it glitters, towering over the city of Rangoon.

The landing station is crowded with men and women clad in butterfly-colours, both sexes freely smoking cheeroots about an inch in diameter, or chewing betel nut. Our friends come to bid us welcome, and we drive through the wide and handsomely laid-out streets, met by numerous yellow-robed priests with begging bowls suspended from their necks; they also carry palm-fans to screen their eyes from women, but they take care to look at them all the same.

Some of the residences, large or small, are literally hidden by tropical trees. Some are handsome stone buildings, but most of them are built of wood on poles from eight to ten feet high, and with deep, sloping roofs. What riches of nature, what profusion of vegetation as contrasted with the famine districts of India! Here the average annual rainfall is 127in.

There is abundant room in this country for immigration. The entire area of Burma (Upper and Lower) is 280,000 square miles. Its population amounts to about 10,000,000.

The chief trade is in teak wood and rice. Of industries, silk-weaving is said to be the most flourishing, though the Burmese themselves prefer the cheap silk made in Great Britain to their own more durable but more expensive homespun.

As in all Buddhist countries, the Burmese women have a happier social position than their Indian sisters. They are in many cases "the better half"—the real bread-winners, while the men loiter about or bask in the sun. No Burmese dreams of taking a dependent position. Most of the servants are recruited from among the Telegu and Tamil emigrants from South India. The latter are called the Scotchmen of the East, as having the most backbone and being more enduring than other Hindu races. Chinese are also numerous. Having the same religion, they easily inter-marry with Burmese women. Their children are considered a great improvement upon the pure Burmese. They inherit industry from both parents, and grow up hard-working, thrifty citizens. Some say that to them will belong the future of Burma.

"CHRISTIANITY WITHOUT GOD."

The Burmese are fond of gambling, and, like the Hindus, squander large sums upon funerals and marriages. To the passing tripper, Buddhism is much less repulsive than Hinduism. Its high moral teaching has been called Christianity without God, as if such a comparison were possible. As a matter of fact, we are told the Buddhist nowadays believes in a personal deity, and herein his belief is better than his creed. But who is his God? It is Buddha himself, the man who, according to his own teaching, passed into Nirvana, a state of unconsciousness, having reached the acme of knowledge in the annihilation of existence. It seems strange that the man who protested so strongly against idol worship should have the greatest number of statues, in the most various positions, erected in his honour—statues of clay, wood, stone, brass, marble, silver, &c., to which offerings are made as to a living God, and yet, if we are to believe his own words, he is dead and gone, never to come again.

Notwithstanding this teaching, the Burmese firmly believe in a re-incarnation of Buddha. Theirs is the land of the White Elephant, called so because their legend affirms that a white elephant is to be the future Buddha.

We do not know how to reconcile with this expectation the other tale, according to which Buddha is to be incarnated in an infant, whose divinity will be established by the four fingers of each hand being of equal length. Mothers are said anxiously to scan for this sign the hands of their new-born babes.

Far more powerful than Buddha worship is the superstitious belief of the people in nats, or demons, evil spirits that must be propitiated by gifts and offerings in order to leave their devotees in peace. They are supposed to have originally been human beings, many of whom met with a sudden or a violent death. Every house, every village, has a guardian spirit of its own. If properly treated, it is supposed to ward off unfriendly spirits. Belief in the transmigration of souls, and gross superstition, lead to the most absurd performances.

Passing a Buddhist graveyard, and noticing a gay throng of people within its gate, we went in. Close to the entrance we noticed a large open shed, and women busy washing cups. In front of it stood a square structure of bamboo, covered with light-coloured paper, in which the coffin was placed on its way to the burying-ground. It was now carried to the grave, some men holding sun-shades over it, followed by a band of native musicians more noisy than melodious in their performance. A large company of men and women followed in their gayest attire, chatting, laughing, giggling, smoking, as if going to a dancing-party! The absence of decorum and solemnity made a sad impression upon us. The coffin was finally lowered, and some of the women sat upon the ground and began to cry. It was a short wail; the tears were quickly wiped away. They then took up their cigars and puffed away resolutely.

"CHEATING DEATH."

The cause of this strange custom, of which we were only able to witness the final scene, was explained to us in the following way:—In the early days of the world, when men first began to die, the ancients asked a spirit or nat to give them advice, and he counselled them not to appear sad when anyone died, but to feast and make merry, and to have bands of music, that the "Prince Death" might not suspect that he had succeeded in grieving them; that on the contrary he might suppose that his efforts to do so had been ineffectual, and so he should be discouraged from making another attempt. The idea of cheating death is a favourite one with the Burmese; but how different from the all-conquering one of the Christian: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" According to other explanations, it is chiefly in fear of evil spirits, which try to carry off the disembodied spirit to infernal regions, that drums and musical instruments are used to frighten them away.

Whatever Buddha may have taught—and it is admitted that he was a great reformer in his time, and a better man, perhaps, than can be seen through the myth of absurd legends—his people are in utter darkness, the slaves of the evil spirits that they worship. Christianity has been showing its light in Burma for almost a century. In fact, Roman Catholic missionaries came to Burma about the year 1722. The first Protestant missionary, known as the Apostle of Burma, was Adoniram Judson. He was born in America in 1788, learned to read when only three years old, entered college at the age of sixteen, and was born again in 1808. In 1812 he married Miss Anna Hasseltine, a woman of remarkable qualities, and a fortnight later embarked with her in a ship bound for Calcutta. After some vicissitudes in India, the couple proceeded to Burma, reaching Rangoon in 1813. Three years after his arrival, Judson completed a grammar of the Burmese language, and the following year he finished a translation of the Gospel of Matthew. He had to wait six years for the first Burmese convert, soon followed by some others.

Times of tribulation intervened. At Ava, in Upper Burma, the missionary endured for twenty-one months the horrors of an Oriental prison, while his wife, exposed to insults in the crowded streets, endeavoured to bring him his food daily.

With the victory of the English, liberty came for the prisoners, and, after the Tenasserim Provinces were ceded to the Indian Empire, Judson settled in Amherst, subsequently removing to Maulmein. At the A.B.M. School for Boys in Maulmein, we saw the room where the first Burmese Bible, completed in 1834, was printed. It is now used as a classroom.

For thirty-seven years Judson toiled in Burma. In 1849 he was seized with fever. The doctor recommending a sea-voyage, he sailed for Mauritius, but died on the way, and was buried at sea.

His first wife is buried at Amherst; with her little babe she was called home in 1826. The grave was so near the shore that ten years ago it was found necessary to remove it a little further inland. A tree that formerly spread its branches over it, was cut down, taken to America, and manufactured into pencils, penholders, napkin-rings, &c. A nice sum was thus realized in aid of the Mission funds.

Carruthers Institute, Pisa.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting was held a few days ago at the Alliance Club on behalf of this old-established educational and evangelical work. Mr. R. C. Morgan presided, and recalled his visit to Miss Carruthers' schools some years ago. He read from a former report the striking testimony of the parish priest to the Cisanello Schools, which, he declared, are the cause why he has to preach on Sundays to empty benches and that the people do not come to his masses and confessions. Mr. Morgan also read an extract from a quite recent letter of a Waldensian pastor, in which he says that the Female Institute supplies a great religious and educational need in Pisa.

Miss Carruthers gave some account of the various branches of work carried on in and around Pisa. Having been often asked how she came to settle in the city, she is now bringing out a series of short chapters in the Protestant Woman, entitled "Personal Reminiscences of Life and Work in the Land of the Papacy."

In 1869 the day schools at Cisanello, attended at present by 120 pupils, were commenced with fifteen children in her own house, a large boys' school in San Michele was opened twelve years ago, and now is attended by ninety-two pupils, although the Grey Friars built a large and imposing monastery close by to oppose the Evangelical School; while in the Female Institute in the town of Pisa, there have been usually not less than 200 pupils in the various classes. The eleven teachers have all been pupils themselves, and profess Protestant principles. Systematic tract distribution is carried on throughout the town and among special classes, such as postmen, cabmen and railway men. A branch of the Y.W.C.A. has now forty members and associates, of whom about two-thirds have been pupils in the schools. Miss Carruthers is also personally much engaged in the publication of books and tracts, and has magic-lantern meetings with Scripture subjects. It is proposed to raise an Endowment Fund, which would greatly cheer the heart of the founder, by enabling her to make some permanent provision for the work. Correspondence may be addressed to Miss Robertson, Foreign Evangelization Society, 11, Oak Hill, Hampstead, N.W.

After Long Pain.

Now give me sleep, my God, and quiet rest;
So long have I been weary and opprest,
I lay me down upon Thy loving breast—
No more to weep.

Draw nearer still, my God, and give me peace;
Bid all the tumult and the suffering cease;
Speak to my heart of comfort and release.
Be mine Thy will.

Give me Thy grace, my God. I ask the more
Because I know Thy endless treasure-store,
Yet see still richer blessing on before—
Seeing Thy Face.

Give me Thy love—love lives when all is done,
Better than joy, brighter than crowns well won.
Beyond earth's shadows deep, beyond earth's sun—
Christ reigns above.

Pictures from Life of Salvation Army Work.

PROBABLY no movement has done more to focus interest and sympathy upon the conditions under which the submerged masses eke out their existence than the "Darkest England" scheme, associated with the name of General Booth. It is not always remembered, however, that this scheme is but one branch of a vast world-wide work out of which it has grown.

The Army aims at forcing upon the attention of all men, whether they have forgotten or have not so much as heard of Him, the Saviour crucified for the whole world. Through its varied instrumentalities men, women, and children are being saved daily from conditions equal to heathen darkness, and are being led to forget self in the service of others. "Living Epistles," the annual report of the spiritual and social undertakings, may be obtained from the Army Headquarters.

The first step in the ladder of social betterment offered to thousands of men and women without home and friends is found in the Shelters. These are, in almost innumerable instances, a means of relieving immediate distress and ameliorating a great deal of misery. They prove in fact the entrance to a life of honest labour, and the bridge which carries men over from the despair and loafing which come of misfortune or misconduct, to a condition of decency, sobriety, and good citizenship. The Shelters and Depôts for the supply of food to their inmates now number 162, with accommodation for 17,343. That the cases dealt with are not entirely confined to the base-borns appears by the testimony of one who had been rescued from the horrible darkness and depths of misery and vice. J—— B—— tells his experiences as and recounts his change from that condition of life to his present position as a responsible official of an important municipality. In the course of his narrative he says:

"You will, perhaps, scarcely credit it, but I have tramped throughout the length and breadth of the land, and have descended to most of the ill-practices peculiar to vagabonds, and also endured much of the hardship they undergo.

"This was my condition when one day I walked into Bradford, in Yorkshire. As was my wont, I spent the night in the casual ward. My appearance was such that I was not surprised when next day a policeman stopped me and made some inquiries into my affairs. My looks, I am bound to say, justified his suspicions. I told him that I was hungry and wanted work, but could not get it. He advised me to go to the Salvation Army Shelter in Peel Street. I took his advice, and my eternal gratitude is due to the Salvation Army for the reception that was afforded me. The officer spoke to me as a man and as a brother. The next day I was given some wood-chopping to do, and followed this occupation for several days.

"My mind was strangely exercised with reflections, engendered by this kindness and by the religious services which were held every night. 'Salvation is good for this life,' was reiterated at every meeting. Now that was capable of test, and I applied the test, and its application convinced me that there was a bright reality in the religion of Christ I had once esteemed so lightly. As the first step from my dead self to nobler things, I went out to the penitent-form with genuine contrition for my past offences, and as a humble suppliant, cried to God to give me grace to persevere in righteousness."

In course of time, this man obtained a situation, in which he proved so capable of adjusting himself to business conditions that he eventually secured a municipal appointment for which there were 500 competitors.

WORK FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.

Another problem dealt with by the Salvation Army is that of giving employment to the multitudes of workless men and women to be found in every large centre of population. Boards of Guardians are increasingly recognizing the methods adopted by the Army in their sixty-four factories or elevators; so that from shelters and workhouses as many men as means will provide for are received and are employed at (or taught) some form of useful labour. No stone is left unturned in encouraging them to seek necessary help from God in leading better lives, and the most hopeless and despairing, as well as those who gladly embrace the opportunity for temporary employment, are often led to a life of Christian service. Once inside the factory, they are treated as friends, and work becomes the high road to better things.

TYPICAL APPLICANTS FOR WORK.

FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

Among those assisted during the year by this agency were many soldiers returned from South Africa. A striking instance is that of two "Tommies," who, on reaching England, drank and lost all their deferred pay, and pawning their belongings, found themselves penniless and homeless at Bury St. Edmunds. They are now working in one of the labour factories. Writing to a sergeant at the Cape, one of the men speaks in terms of warm appreciation of what is being done for them:—

"I am carpentering; Joe is working at an elevator in Bermondsey. We have comfortable beds, plenty of wholesome food, and while we have perfect liberty to clear out if we like, we would as soon think of doing so as we would join the King's enemies.

"The work just suits us fellows. I am helping with an extension at one of the Army's bakeries, and when I heard this morning the story of two other chaps' downfall, and how thankful they were for the bit of grub they were eating, and that they were away from their old temptations, I felt quite religious like. I was doing a good turn for myself, and at the same time giving a leg-up to other wounded fellows.

"I have signed the pledge, and I see things in a light I never did before. I went to work when quite a lad, and enlisted out of a 'pub.' My education was neglected, as you know. What I have learned has been under the Colours; but this Army is teaching us how to make men of ourselves."

THE FARM COLONY.

At the mouth of the Thames is one of the most interesting philanthropic experiments which has ever been made, and the Farm Colony shows what can be done by placing waste men on waste land. A greater contrast can scarcely be imagined than the condition of a pauper shut up within the walls of a union, or breaking stones in a workhouse yard, and the same man employed in market gardening on the land, surrounded by those who wish to help him to a better life. The Farm Colony has proved indeed a valuable agency for the moral and social rehabilitation of those who have gone under in the battle of life. One who has proved its utility, after relating the terrible story of his downfall, writes:—

"The change came about in the simplest fashion. At the end of a long debauch, when I had recovered from the 'D.T's.', I crawled, penniless, into a Salvation Army Shelter. I had met the Army before, in Brisbane; but I was too proud then. Now my will was broken, and my conceit subdued; and at the very first meeting in the Shelter to which I had gone for refuge, I took the place of an unworthy penitent, and God came into my life. With that meeting came a true revelation of myself and of the power of God to save me.

"A few days after I tramped down to General Booth's Farm Colony, sleeping in barns and behind hedges on the way. That walk was to me what the march from Egypt was to the Israelites. I crossed my Red Sea; and the Farm Colony of the Salvation Army proved my Canaan."

"When she was gone I stood and thought, 'If that girl can alter, surely there is a chance for me.' I made up my mind I would go into one of the Homes and have a look at it. I told my friends what I meant to do, and they laughed. When I told the officer I was willing to go to one of Mrs. Booth's Homes, she left me no time to change my mind.

"When I had been in the Home about a fortnight, the officer in charge had a little meeting with us after dinner. I suppose she saw how wretched I was, for she kept that meeting on without a break till five o'clock, and all for my sake. Oh! how they pleaded with me! Oh! how they prayed! And at last, after all that time, I gave way. I had never had such a feeling before. I felt that the Saviour forgave my sins. Since that afternoon all desire to go back to my old life has disappeared. God helped me to be of some blessing to the other girls in the Home, and to try and repay the officers a little for their love, patience, and faith."

MEETING OF OUT-O'-WORKS.

SAVING THE LOST.

Seventeen years ago Mrs. Bramwell Booth, assisted by one devoted helper, opened a small receiving house in a back street in the East of London with the idea of befriending young girls who were found in need by Salvation Army officers in the course of their visiting. To-day the Army has 115 rescue homes in different parts of the world, besides shelters and industrial institutions carried on on behalf of the same class; and every year the opportunities which present themselves for adding still to this network of mercy are far more numerous than can be taken advantage of. Last year 5,850 women were received into the Homes, and placed under the care of those who are toiling for the salvation of their bodies and souls.

The confessions of one out of hundreds saved from a sinful life on the streets reveal the consecrated patience and devotion needed to rescue those who are sinking in the vortex of West-End vice:—

"The adjutant in charge of the midnight post seemed to take a special interest in me, though why I never could tell. I used to try and avoid her, and got the girls to warn me when she was coming along.

"When I think of it now, I cannot understand the patience of those officers! Why, it must have been for nearly nine years in all that they reasoned and talked and pleaded with me. I should think the adjutant spoke to me night after night for eighteen months. And yet during all that time I was never really sober.

"At last I began to say to the officers, 'Suppose I come with you, what will you give me to do?' But I never believed their answers. Then one Thursday afternoon I met an old friend of mine who had left the streets, and gone through one of the Homes, and who was then doing well. She told me as much as she could about the Home, and the new stand in life she had made. I asked, 'Would they do that for me?' She answered, 'Yes,' and began telling me some more about the love and kindness of the officers. I am afraid I did not believe a quarter of it. 'It is not really so,' I decided. 'She is only making it up.'

It is difficult to conceive of a more Christ-like work than this. Truly God is "not unmindful to forget the work and labour of love" of those who thus are "not weary in well-doing."

WRONGED CHILDHOOD.

The following excerpts, from a letter written to a friend by the officer in charge of a Home for wronged children, throw some light on neglected and abused child-life:—

"I am afraid I have not a little girl whom you could adopt just now; but you are quite correct in supposing that the Women's Social Department protects and helps ill-treated and sorely-abused children, and rescues some from dangers whose depths they, fortunately, never know. The histories of most of these are too sad to relate in detail. The most terrible thing about it is that if some of these had only been brought up in your sunny and wholesome nursery, instead of in the foul gutters, overcrowded tenements, and vile lodging-houses where they have found 'home,' they would have been as sweet and pure as the fair human flowers you have cherished with so much care. What would become of a bonnie-faced laddie, brought up in the fœtid atmosphere of a low lodging-house, whose mother's proudest boast of her two-year-old was that ''E swears beautiful!'

"There was our little Lily ——. Her father had died; the mother lived with some brute of a fellow who was always beating and kicking the child. She had not a friend in the world to whom to appeal; nobody to run away to.

"In this condition she was brought to us—bruised, broken, wretched—a mother, when she should have been still in pinafores. No, she was not a child with immoral tendencies; most decidedly not. It was sheer misfortune and helplessness. She has now been three years in her present situation, giving every satisfaction, and her baby is cared for in 'The Nest.'"

LIVING IN SLUMLAND.

Whether in London, Glasgow, Liverpool, Belfast, or elsewhere, the inhabitants of slumland live a life of almost entire separation from the rest of the populace. Their whole system of subsistence is different, and they scarcely intermingle at all. In order to reach this class of people, certain Salvation Army officers are set apart to reside among them, making their habits, needs, and well-being a constant study. Halls and dwellings are occupied in quarters seldom visited by strangers, but in which its officers, dressed in the garb of Slum Sisters, are always welcome.

Much of the labour thus devoted to the lowest of the people seems to bear but little immediate fruit; but some of the seed sown springs up and yields a rich harvest. In some of these little Slum Societies, hidden away among the grim miles of houses, young men and women have been won for Christ and trained to serve Him in the midst of hideous conflict, and have gone away, at His call, to live and fight and even die in His cause.

But in addition, the officers who live among the slummers find ever open to them an enormous field of work in ministering to the needs of sick, aged, and children. Day and night they labour for these, caring for the old and infirm, watching over the drunken, washing the neglected children, praying with the dying, and taking a ray of light into the haunts of squalor and misery. The influence of the workers upon the young people, many of whom are exiled from wholesome surroundings, and are destined to pass from an infancy of misery to a youth and maidenhood of vice, cannot be over-estimated. They are their friends and advisers in trouble, and among these young folk there are many beautiful instances of true faith in God, and an earnest following after that which is good.

HELPING CRIMINAL AND INEBRIATE.

The arrangement by which the Salvation Army officers are now admitted to interview any prisoners who express a desire to see them, is working satisfactorily. It is, however, the discharged prisoner that is brought under the more direct influence of the organization. When he or she walks through the jail gates on the morning of discharge, an officer is among the waiting crowd. There is an offer of friendship and a place to go to, with a chance of work and kindness. Numbers of those helped have returned to honest lives, and thus cheer the workers to persevere in their difficult task.

What can be done for the confirmed drunkard? was a question which after years of consideration found an answer in the establishment of an Inebriates' Home at Hadleigh. It will accommodate thirty men, and is a new venture; for, though work on behalf of women inebriates has been carried on with success for some years, this institution, set apart for men of that class, has only been open about eighteen months. The place is carried on in the simplest fashion, and work for all the inmates is found either in the gardens or on the Land Colony.

Notwithstanding the difficulties to be encountered in reclaiming women inebriates, the results have more than justified the endeavours in this direction. Doubt has always been expressed as to the possibility of effectively dealing with this evil, hence it is all the more gratifying to know that more than 50 per cent. of the women entrusted to the care of the Army have been restored; while of the remainder a considerable number have gone so far in physical or mental decay as to render them scarcely suitable for any treatment than that which can be given under the supervision of an asylum rather than a hospital.

It will be obvious to all who give the matter a moment's consideration that such work as this cannot be carried on without the expenditure of money. During next year it is estimated that for the work referred to in "Living Epistles" at least £38,000 will be required.

London's Working Boys.

ANOTHER year's experience among the army of young workers in the Metropolis has served to impress the committee of the seven Homes for Working Boys in London with the growing appreciation of the shelter and help which the institutions provide. The number of friendless working lads, with no one to take a personal interest in their present and future welfare, who apply for admission to the Homes, is one of the strongest proofs that the need for the existence of the institutions has not diminished.

INFLUENCES—GOOD AND EVIL.

Since the year 1870, no fewer than 7,828 boys have passed through the Homes. Not merely have the boys been provided with a shelter, and taught the wisdom of leading an industrious, thrifty and honest life, but an endeavour has been made to teach them the importance of an early recognition of the will of God in all things. The outcome has been not only the formation of prayerful habits and regular attendance at the house of God, but many of the lads have surrendered themselves to Christ.

The committee keep in view the primary object of the work by giving preference to those who are most exposed to danger by reason of their earning small wages. When the boys are able to keep themselves respectably, the circumstances are considered, and a definite time is fixed for them to secure suitable lodgings. Last year 298 boys were admitted, who were in most cases out of employment, while others were making a start in life.

The circumstances which have rendered the boys destitute are varied and often pathetic. James ——, for instance, aged 16, was taken to the office by a mission worker at Tottenham. The boy was utterly destitute, and an orphan. He had never been in regular employment, and had sold newspapers in the streets, living in a common lodging-house when receiving sufficient money from his precarious work. The missionary had watched him for a long time, and could speak well of him. The superintendent was therefore able to place him in a good situation where he will learn a trade.

TURNED ADRIFT.

George —— saw the notice of the Homes in a Cocoa Room, and made application at Hanbury House, that being the nearest. His story was immediately investigated, and the superintendent found that the father was dead, and the mother had driven the boy from home by her drunken habits. The lad's clothes were frequently taken away and pawned, and even his bed had been sold for drink. He was in a weak state, and had to be nursed for a time. The boy has proved himself worthy of help, his conduct at work and in the Home being all that could be desired.

The problem of finding suitable accommodation near their work is one that perplexes adults, but how much more so the friendless boy! The younger lads could not possibly meet the expenses of travelling by rail to and from their work, as many do not earn more than sufficient to pay for a respectable lodging and the plainest of food; and were it not for the Homes it must be admitted that many of these would have to live in perilous conditions. There are a few vacancies for respectable boys. The secretary is Mr. William Denham, 12, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

London Lock Hospital.—The Bishop of London, who evinces a warm interest in the Lock Hospital and Home, preached the annual sermon on behalf of the institution at Harrow Road Chapel. In the course of a powerful address, the Bishop urged his hearers to consider what the charity achieves. Our sisters are brought into the hospital where they receive at once the most efficient treatment for their bodily ills. But more than that, they find themselves in a home of love surrounded by the ministry of loving women, in touch with the ladies who visit the hospital, and under Christian influence. Dr. Winnington Ingram referred to the striking difference between the faces of those who have just entered the hospital, and those who have recovered their self-respect. It was gratifying to know that 75 per cent. of the girls who leave henceforth lead virtuous lives.

The Battle for Bread.

LONDON'S STARVING POOR.

BITTER weather necessarily increases the miseries of the very poor who, having at all times a keen struggle to make ends meet, are driven to extremity for fuel and clothing when the blasts of winter blow.

The severity of the position is accentuated in the great centres of population, whither the out-o'-work makes his way, lured by the vain hope of obtaining employment. While at the present time most of our important cities are more or less affected, there can be no doubt that the trouble has assumed portentous proportions in the metropolis.

SUFFERING AT POPLAR.

Taking East London first, let us glance at the state of Poplar. The ex-mayor, than whom no one can speak with closer knowledge of the truth, gives the following typical cases:—

"A man came to me yesterday morning. 'Please can you put me in the way of a job? I've applied to the Guardians for relief, but they say all they can do is to offer me and the old girl the workhouse. All I want is to earn a bit o' money to pay the rent, now seven weeks due, and then we could pick up a bit o' grub somehow.' The Guardians as you know, have no power to pay a person's rent.

BREAKFASTLESS CHILDREN.

"I went down one of our courts a few days ago," continues the ex-mayor, "and as far as I could gather there wasn't a man in the place who had been able to get a job for some weeks. One woman said: 'I hope you have brought a bit of work for the old man.' Another said: 'I wish you could give that woman over the way a few ha'pence; she had to send her children to school without a bite this morning, and she's so upset about it, and doesn't know how they'll get on, as it's the first time she's had to do it.'"

THE SHIPLESS DOCKS.

In the course of a brief chat with a representative of The Christian, a well-known Poplar caterer who takes a brotherly interest in the welfare of his customers, summed up the causes of the distress. When the docks have no work to offer, nearly everybody and everything suffers in consequence. The dock dues were raised some nine months ago, and we understand that shipowners find it cheaper to unload at Southampton and send their London goods on by rail. This means, of course, that hundreds of our men are left workless. Then, again, the ranks of the unemployed are swollen by the arriving reservists; companies having work to offer not unnaturally try to find work for these men, but there are only so many jobs, and if the reservists get them, others are left without. It is a matter of displacement, not of remedy.

"Moreover, one big firm of shipbuilders recently discharged no fewer than 150 men, owing to the scarcity of work. All this means extreme poverty right through Poplar and 'Sailor Town.' Allow me to illustrate the sufferings of the people by the simple fact that my takings average £600 a year less than they did seven years ago. It is heartbreaking to see good sturdy fellows who used to spend, say, sixpence on a plain dinner, creep in disconsolately and have just a halfpennyworth. They are glad even to sit down and rest, and I have seen some eagerly pick up scraps of bread from the floor to satisfy their hunger."

"MY POOR OLD MOTHER."

At the East India Dock Gates, our representative found groups of men, evidently not loungers or public-house haunters, but genuine dockers, bent on hard work, and evidently electing to suffer in silence rather than advertize their woes.

One had earned but two shillings in three weeks. "I was out this morning at half-past five," he said, "on a four-mile tramp to the Albert Dock, but I came back as I went. I've been a docker these twenty years, but, where there used to be work for a thousand, there's now not enough for a hundred. The rush for a job is just awful. You can't form any idea of it. I know scores of men who have done nothing at all these six weeks. And some are worse off than me—having families to provide for—although my wife is dead and gone, but my old mother, seventy-five years old, is dependent on me. And when this cold weather sets in things are terrible. Many have gone to 'the House.' I just met a man who has walked the streets these four nights. That's one thing in summer, but another in a bitter November, isn't it? 'How do these men exist?' You can scarcely say they do exist. They carry a box or hold a horse, or get a penny off a friend in work."

Another man was an experienced and intelligent boiler-maker, turned fifty years of age. "It gets worse and worse," said he. "I know fifty men out of work in our lodge (of the Boiler-Makers' Society). There are many reasons for it. One is, we have taught foreign nations how to do the work, and now they do it themselves instead of sending it to us."

Wherever one turned similar stories were to be heard, and none was more striking than that of a worthy old stevedore, who described, in thrilling terms, the struggle for employment. "When a ship comes in there are 500 men in waiting, and only fifty can be taken on."

DISTRESS AT BOW.

At the East London Tabernacle, Rev. Edwin H. Ellis and his workers are earnestly endeavouring to cope with the need. Mr. Ellis writes:—"The severe weather of late has brought deep distress in the East End. Everything is dear, work is slack at the docks, the unrestricted influence of aliens has sent up the rents, so that houses which, a few years ago, let for 10s. weekly, now let for 15s.

"The workhouses are overcrowded. Among children and men seeking work bronchitis and pneumonia, consequent on the lack of nourishment, is painfully on the increase. To try and cope with this distress, a trained nurse for the sick poor has been engaged, and already is finding that her hands are full of work. The services of another Sister, who has had long and varied experience in Mission work and the needs of the poor, have been secured, thus making four active workers at present engaged in seeking to help those who cannot well help themselves.

"The distressing cases of destitution met with call for immediate sympathy and practical help. Gifts of cast-off clothing for women, girls, and children, blankets, grocery, hospital letters, and any other aid will be gratefully received."

IN WEST LONDON.

In the heart of the Lisson Grove district of West London Miss Meredith Brown has carried on effective mission work from the Shaftesbury Institute and the Deaconess House. Her experience, therefore, well qualifies her to speak of the people's present needs. She writes:—

"The feature of Marylebone is the strong contrast of wealth and poverty, and perhaps in no quarter are want and luxury more sharply defined and less realized. Truly, 'the rich and the poor meet together,' yet how wide is the gulf of separation. Here, spacious residences, incalculable wealth, freedom from care; there, insanitary, comfortless, overcrowded dwellings, fitful employment and small wages, aggravated by high rents and costly living.

"No mere description can convey to the mind the appalling misery as it actually exists! In one of the narrow streets is a house without a door, and a room with a bare floor and no furniture, where every pane of glass in the window is broken—nothing to keep the cold wind from blowing through; that room is filled nightly with homeless men or women!

"Volumes might be filled with the harrowing facts which come under the notice of those who visit in this neighbourhood, but one case must suffice:—The family consists of father, mother, and five children. The father has been out of work for some time, and he starts at 2.45 a.m. to get in front of the crowd that wait, in the hope that he may get parish work on the roads. He has gone day after day without success, but he says he will go on till he gets it. The eldest girl, fourteen years of age, rises early, and starts out at a quarter to five, walking a long distance to get bread a farthing cheaper; then she buys the old blocks of wood left from mending the streets, which are sold to the poor at a cheap rate; after which she goes home to stay in the house and take care of her four delicate sisters and brothers, while the mother toils for the maintenance of the family, not returning till after ten p.m."

BERMONDSEY.

At the Working Men's Mission, New Cut (Messrs. T. and J. Young, superintendents), Mr. John Pearce (Pearce and Plenty) gave a meat tea to 250 poor deserving men. As one well acquainted with the battle of life, he urged the men to turn to the Lord and abstain from drink. Each man also received a ticket, value twopence, and twopence in cash.

To show the present distress, one young man, who is one of the many out-of-work folk, took his twopence home. This was all they had for supper and breakfast, being a pennyworth of margarine and a pennyworth of bread (three in number).

Coming to the mission one morning the superintendent saw a man pick bread out of the gutter and eat it. It was a pleasure to relieve the poor fellow with a good meal of soup and bread. Here is another case. A policeman met a poor fellow out of work that he knew, and asked us for change of a shilling to give the man some coppers to get food at our kitchen. Such cases can be multiplied. The distress in this part of London is very great, and will be severely felt this winter.

MILDMAY MISSION.

Mrs. Codner mentions other illustrative cases among the thousands visited by the Mildmay Deaconesses, who carry with them the message of a Saviour's love and grace, and minister (as funds may enable) to their temporal necessities. Very tragic is the appeal for help coming from the empty grate! "I've a fire this afternoon," says a poor mother, "because I borrowed a penny from a neighbour for a few pounds of coal. The children were so cold. This is the one I am most sorry for," she adds (cuddling a fourteen-month infant in her arms); she does cry so, because she doesn't understand." How many silent "cries" go up from shivering ones who do understand!

Sad, also, are the privations of some of the sick folk, for whom beef tea and good milk are ordered in vain. Their means are so narrow that they can afford no extra nourishment when health is worse than usual.

(1) In a small, dark back room, bare, but very clean, lies a man of about forty, suffering from acute rheumatism. On the bed (doing duty for coverlet) is a coloured thing that was once a tablecloth, and which, in spite of careful darning, is now fast falling to pieces. The top sheet is a patchwork, and there are no blankets.

(2) A cheerful old woman, getting very bent, and breaking fast, has only 3s. 6d. to call her own, and dark days are setting in upon her. The landlady can only promise to keep her until Christmas, unless help comes. Was found lying in bed one day, to keep warm and save the coals!"

(3) "I find I cannot go on much longer, Miss," said an industrious widow, "and what will become of my children? I've never had a day's holiday—never seen the country for twelve years; but if I could only keep on I shouldn't mind. I've worked for the sake of my children, and now it's hard for me to break down when I'm only thirty-six, and them not grown up." While the mother was talking, the eldest girl, Minnie, a tall, pale child of fourteen, came in. The story of Minnie is almost as bad as her mother's. She goes to a factory every morning at 9 a.m. and returns at 8 p.m., for which she earns 5s. a week—the rent money. Besides this, Minnie works very hard at night and never murmurs at her lot; indeed, the children's only fear seems to be that mother might get worse and have to leave them.

(4) A "dear old grannie" lives in a basement room at the back of a North London house. Her face bespeaks her one of the Lord's children. She has brought up a family, but life has been one long, hard struggle. "I can do with little," she says, but her need is for a more sufficing "little."

These cases, of course, are representative. Christian workers in all parts of the metropolis could give many more from their daily experience in ministering to the poor, and it is earnestly to be hoped that those of the Lord's people who have means will, in this season of exceptional stress and trial, come to the help of the poverty-stricken sufferers of the great city in their battle for bread.

The Gospel and the Poor.

IT must cheer the heart of any who know anything of the vicissitudes of the suffering poor, as they are found in the far-reaching human jungles and morasses of destitute East London, to learn of the quiet yet persistent endeavours of one and another of our Home missions in seeking to serve and succour the helpless, friendless and lost.

On Thursday last week was held the annual meeting of the North-East London Gospel Mission, with which are also connected the ample Southern Homes of Rest at Lancing-on-Sea, Sussex. Little did the present superintendent (Mr. Chorley)—when invited to care for the spiritual activities of a small mission work among a colony of Kingsland "costers" in his spare hours some thirty-three years since—anticipate that he was destined to see that little seedling branch out to one "centre" after another, and that from the tiny cottage a few miles away from the fog-bound slums there should spring the present many-sided seaside Homes of Rest.

The story told of this the thirty-third year of Mr. Chorley's superintendence was one that made all who heard it say, "What hath God wrought!" There are Gospel services, children's meetings, factory girls' institute, gutter lads' night school, open-air bands, meals to the hungry, soup kitchen, sales of garments at nominal charges, penny clubs, widows' sewing class, mothers' meetings, and many other activities.

But special mention should be made of the visitation work. The stories told by those who visit the poor and suffering were of the most heart-aching kind. Brighter moments, however, cheered the large congregation present when the helpers from the Lancing Homes told their happy experiences. One lady, accepted for foreign missionary service, told how she had spent the three summer months at Lancing, taking charge of the children's branch, and her testimony to the blessing attending the bands of children going and returning every fortnight, was such as to evoke the warmest expressions of praise to God. The recounting of the conversions of those of riper years was also a remarkable testimony.

A pathetic interest attached to the story of the "Home for the Aged and Dying," as Mr. Chorley had to tell of the home-call of another of the aged inmates. Martha Haviland was eighty-three years of age, and pointing under a side gallery, Mr. Chorley showed the seat this aged disciple regularly filled till her failing strength told her life's work was done. Three years of quiet joy in restful retirement were added to her before she fell asleep.

The total of the receipts for the year was £4,575 13s. 8d., and the expenses £4,578 1s. 9d., which left a small balance on the wrong side. Mr. Chorley's address is 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.

Missionaries for Central Asia.—In connection with the Central Asian Pioneer Mission, a valedictory service was held a few days ago in Marsh Street Congregational Church, Walthamstow, to bid God-speed to Rev. W. S. Norwood and Miss E. Hopley (who has since become Mrs. Norwood). These are the first workers to go forth under the auspices of the Mission, and as both are members of Marsh Street Church there was a large gathering of friends, presided over by Rev. C. Wickham (pastor). In the course of the valedictory address Mr. J. W. Stranks explained that the meeting was the outcome of the Spirit's working in the heart of a young man.

Worn-out City Missionaries.

THE London City Mission exercises praiseworthy care for its veteran and disabled workers, so that in the evening of life they may be free from financial anxiety. Many of them still labour earnestly for the Master. As Mr. James Dunn says in his brightly written annual report entitled, "Visions at Eventide," they are "bringing forth fruit in old age, and it has been most refreshing to the secretary, in his visitation of many of them, to see how they try to be useful, as far as enfeebled health and old age permit. Some occasionally give addresses at meetings, conduct weekly prayer meetings, visit the sick, and speak with individuals about their souls' salvation."

These aged saints have striking stories to tell of long and varied experience in the Lord's work. For example, Mr. Abraham Scarr says: "Forty-two years ago I was appointed by the Mission to visit that abode of sickness and death, the large infirmary connected with Whitechapel. The whole of my missionary life has been spent in ministering to the aged and infirm, the sick and dying, in that institution. My mind goes back to some strange, some awful, and, blessed be God, some glorious death-bed scenes that I have witnessed. I suppose that the average number of deaths has been about one a day, so that during my forty-two years I have ministered to over 15,000 souls who came there to die! I doubt not that I shall meet many of them in heaven." A spirit of patient resignation is displayed by those who are suffering.

One missionary, who has been pensioned after a long and useful career, says:—"My two last years were exceedingly trying on account of failing health. Bright's Disease had me in its grip, and after serving the Mission for twenty years I was obliged, in April, 1902, to give up work entirely, and fall back upon the kindness of the committee. I suffer very much at times, and I think my end must be near; but I can trust the love and wisdom of my heavenly Father, and so leave myself in His hands. I am devoutly thankful for the sympathy and help of the friends of the Disabled Fund, which relieves me of anxiety in my weakness and pain."

DUSTMEN AND CANAL WORKERS.

Another notable experience is that of Mr. Charles Woodall, who says:—"For twenty-five years I tried to glorify my Master in the dust-yards in Paddington, and on the canals of London. It was a very rough field of service, for many times my life has been threatened, and sometimes I have been rather severely dealt with, through stopping fights, and trying to be faithful in my work. Many of the roughest characters and my most bitter opponents have been won for the Saviour; some of them have gone to be with Him, but others are serving Him here below. The hard toil and rough weather brought on severe colds which deprived me of my hearing, and I became 'deaf as a post.' I am seventy-three years of age, and now, in the eventide of life, I love to review the old battle-grounds."

During the past year five more worthy men have been compelled to retire from active service. These, too, have been placed on the Disabled Fund, receiving £1 per week each. Seven widows and three orphans have also been added to the roll of those who, by the help of the Lord's people, are thus remembered in their time of special need.

Mr. Dunn's address is: London City Mission, 3, Bridewell Place, E.C.

A Contrast.—In view of the recent census of church attendance at Liverpool, it is interesting to note that just over the border at Bootle, the Sun Hall, in Stanley Road, with accommodation for over 1,400, is crowded every Sunday evening, and on many occasions numbers have to be turned away. The service is an evangelical one, and is conducted by Mr. Heber Radcliffe. The week-night gathering for prayer, as well as the cottage and mothers' meetings, attract large attendances, and the spirit revival which is so manifest is distinctly encouraging at a moment when so many are lamenting the lack of enthusiasm in Christian service.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, November 30. 1 Kings xviii.

NOTICE that "the word of the Lord came" to Elijah on four successive occasions (xvii. 2-8; xviii. 1; xix. 9). God has many things to say to us, if only we will listen. His word may find us in very different circumstances, and direct us to varied places and duties; but to live by it is to execute the perfected plan of life.

Obadiah was a good man, but weak. Court manners had corrupted him. He stood before Ahab, while Elijah stood before God. Our Lord said that soft raiment and king's courts go together; and it is granted to very few to maintain the spirit and power of the Baptist amid the enervating atmosphere of courts.

Too many of us are halting between two opinions. The altar of consecration to Christ, which once stood in our heart, has been thrown down (30); the worship of Baal, which stands for creature-energy; and of Astarte, which may represent impure and unclean desires, have secretly stolen away our heart from Him whom once we loved exclusively; and, as the necessary consequence, our heart is drought-smitten, and our congregation or Sunday-school class yields no harvest. There is no remedy but by returning to our first works.

What is true of the individual applies to the Church. Often there arises a general desire for revival, and the Church, like Elijah, ascends Carmel to pray; but first, Elijah slew Baal's prophets, and turned again the heart of Israel to Jehovah. Let the Church of God put away her worldliness and indulgence of the flesh—let the sword be used ruthlessly—and the showers will ere long descend copiously on the thirsty soil.

MONDAY, December 1. 1 Kings xix.

It may be that physical weariness was largely accountable for this failure. The strain of that day in Carmel, followed by the swift running in front of Ahab's fiery steeds, from Carmel to the entrance to Jezreel, must have been prodigious. Then the sudden dashing of Elijah's hopes to the ground by the message of Jezebel, who he had fondly anticipated would have been awed and checkmated by the massacre of her favourite priests, must have been an awful disappointment. His feet had almost gone, his steps had well-nigh slipped.

But how graciously God dealt with him. Though He foreknew all his failure, He did not refuse to use him. And when he lay under the juniper-bush, asking to die, his Heavenly Father sent him—first refreshing sleep, and then food and water specially prepared. He knew his frame and remembered that he was dust. God does not excuse our sins, but He is well aware of all extenuating circumstances, which may largely account for them.

In the cave, nature seemed to explain Elijah to himself. She has often done the same for others. There is a remarkable suggestion among scientific men that matter can respond to external stimulus. Are not dead things sentient? Here at least were the moods of the prophet's soul reflected in the passion of wind and earthquake! But God is not in storm or earthquake, nor in those more sudden and revolutionary methods on which Elijah laid the greatest stress, but in the gentlest and softest movements, which have no voice above a whisper, though they are energetic in summoning strong men to fresh responsibilities.

TUESDAY, December 2. 1 Kings xx.

This is an interesting chapter, because it shows the tendency, characteristic of all idolatrous nations, to localize the deities, which have emanated from the minds of their votaries, to certain localities. Idol gods are always local gods. They are gods of the valleys or of the hills, but not of both; of this land, but not of that. How different is the conception of God!

Slowly on the mind of Israel broke the knowledge of the universality of the Divine Nature; that He was not the God of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles also; that He loved the world, and gave His Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the race; and that in every nation, as Peter put it, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted. Still, the mistake of Ben-hadad and his captains crops up from time to time among us. We think that God is nearer to us in the church than in the store. We suppose that we may do things in Paris which we shrink to do in London. We admit that He helped us in the valleys; but how will it be with us when we come to the hills?

"Busy here and there!" (40). Thus opportunities of speaking a word in season, of witnessing for Christ, slip through our hands, while we are engaged in trifles.

WEDNESDAY, December 3. 1 Kings xxi.

Naboth might have done a good stroke of business, from a worldly point of view, by selling his estate to Ahab; a royal price and assured kingly favour might have been his—BUT, he had a conscience! Clear above the persuasive tones of the monarch's offer sounded the voice of God: "The land shall not be sold for ever, for the land is Mine" (Lev. xxv. 23). "The inheritance of the children of Israel shall not remove . . . for every one shall cleave to the inheritance of his fathers" (Num. xxxvi. 7). "Moreover the prince shall not take the people's inheritance (Ezek. xlvi. 18).

How insidious the arguments that might have been used on the other side, but Naboth was proof against them all. "The Lord forbid it me that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee." A bold man was he, thus to withstand the king to his face, but it was holy boldness, born of faith in God. How often, in lesser matters, if similarly placed, do we yield, to our eternal loss!

Might we not have expected that at the crucial moment God would intervene to save this faithful man, even as he did with Daniel, with his three friends, with Hezekiah, and others? Ah! we cannot fathom the mysteries of His dealings. But though Naboth suffered at the hands of those "who kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do," yet he won an eternal inheritance among the saints in light; and countless numbers since his day have been strengthened by his example to maintain the conflict against the crafty forces of evil. Naboths and Stephens may breathe their last under the prolonged agony of showers of stones, but Elijahs and Pauls arise the stronger and the better equipped to pursue the fight and help the surviving saints of God. Even Christ "was obedient unto death," that through him we might live.

This story is full of lessons of terrible import for us who live in the light of the Gospel day. No casuistry can make wrong right, or clothe sin with a halo of clever excuse.

> Nor florid prose, nor honeyed lies of rhyme,
> Can hallow evil deeds, or consecrate a crime.

Death is not the worst evil that can befall. Deterioration of character, leading to eternal ruin, is more greatly to be feared. At all costs "hold fast that which is good." "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life." Jehovah sees, and hears, and knows, and His hand will punish, even if it does not save.

THURSDAY, December 4. 1 Kings xxii.

Two of God's servants pass before our eyes in this chapter—Jehoshaphat and Micaiah. They are typical men. The king was undoubtedly a good man. He had wrought a great work in Judah; but at this time he was in a very questionable position. How came he to say to Ahab, "I am as thou art, my people as thy people, and my horses as thy horses"? What right had he to go into battle in such company? It is quite clear that he was uneasy, hence his insistence that a prophet of Jehovah should be called in to announce the Divine will regarding the expedition. The prophet in his dungeon, with his bread and water of affliction, was a happier man by far than the king, though clad in royal robes, and held in high respect.

Micaiah stated, as a graphic picture or parable, his prevision of the result of the fight. It was a forcible method of conveying the truth that the cup of Ahab's iniquity was full, and that the arrow at a venture was the permitted executor of Divine retribution. Had Micaiah not spoken, men would have attributed this apparently chance arrow as a misfortune; now, however, it must be viewed as a providence.

Chance arrows are the most deadly. Put on, therefore, the whole armour of God, so only can you stand in the evil day. But see that you seek for the calm, strong position of Micaiah, though the Ahabs hate you, rather than the questionable position of a Jehoshaphat, though all love you. It will not be necessary to banish yourself; you will be hated and shunned if you speak the truth; but in your loneliness and isolation you will have God.

FRIDAY, December 5. 2 Kings i.

The king's accident was probably due to the giving way of the balustrade which surrounded the roof of his palace. It was specially insisted on in the law that this lattice-work should be made strong, so as to obviate just such accidents as this (Deut. xxii. 8). We ought to be very careful to maintain the barrier of habit, of purity, of total abstinence in good repair, both for our own sakes and the sake of those who dwell with us in our home.

It was an awful fate that overtook these captains, but it must be remarked that they were extremely insolent in their tone and their attempt to dragoon the prophet into swift obedience to their command. The altered voice of the last captain wrought an instant alteration in the prophet's attitude. At the same time we can never forget the way in which our Lord rebuked His apostles when they proposed to deal in the same way with certain villagers (Luke ix. 54). In that reply we learn to distinguish between the spirit of the dispensations, and are taught that the Bible is a history of the progress of revelation and of God's education of His people. Not all at once did the day reach its meridian, but by almost insensible advances. Only on looking back, can we realize how great the progress has been.

It is remarkable that those very villages of Samaria, on which the disciples might not call fire, were visited in after days by the fire of the Holy Spirit. This is the fire which we may all call from heaven (Acts viii.).

SATURDAY, December 6. 2 Kings ii.

One does not know whether to admire more the humility of Elijah or the pertinacity of Elisha. Elijah's humility was very beautiful. An ordinary man would have blazoned abroad the honour which awaited him. He would have reasoned with himself that it would be to the glory of God to have a witness of his translation, for otherwise it would be unrecognised and unknown. Instead of this, he did his best to leave Elisha behind him, so that no eye might see the Father's carriage come for him. But Elisha's determination not to be put off was equally beautiful; and it is only those who stand such tests as this that can behold the great things which God hath prepared for those that love Him. Happy is the soul which, amid much failure and sin, can say, "My soul followeth hard after Thee." What lessons are in these words when we apply them to ourselves and Christ: "They two went on . . . they two stood by Jordan . . . they two went over on dry ground . . . they still went on and talked."

We, too, would have a double portion of Elijah's Spirit. It was the inheritance of the eldest son. But everything depends on the purity of our hearts, and whether we can see. If Elisha had not been able to see into the eternal world, which enwrapt them both, he would at once have been proved to be of a gross and sensual nature, which lacked power to receive. Inability to see would have implied inability to receive. If you see Him who is invisible, by a faith which is the evidence of things not seen, then you can take. But the taking is a matter, not of feeling, but of faith. It is only as you stand by Jordan, and the moment of need arises, that it becomes evident that the Spirit of Elijah doth rest upon Elisha.

About Temperance.

LAST Sunday was Temperance Day for Sunday-schools, and next Sunday the same subject will be referred to in many churches and chapels for grown-up people. As I have never had a chat with you about it in this column, I am going to do so now.

A long time ago we had a talk about "Fighting our Friends," in which I pointed out that temptations that come to us in a friendly sort of way, or from kind and well-meaning persons, are harder to resist than those which we know to be wrong, or which come from bad companions. We may naturally be on our guard against the last; but are often tripped up unawares by the others. Solomon said (Prov. i. 10), "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not;" but it is equally important to remember, "If friends entice thee, consent thou not."

Now I suppose that as children we are more often tempted to take strong drink by friends than by "sinners," especially at Christmas parties, for instance. There were three circumstances, when I was a very little boy, that influenced me to become a teetotaler. The first was at a Christmas party. I had an idea (perhaps a foolish one!) that it was polite to say "No, thank you," when offered anything in another person's house—at any rate, the first time—though I generally "gave in" if I was asked again. So on this occasion, when asked if I would like a glass of wine, I declined, and was rather surprised, and perhaps a little disappointed, when my hostess did not ask me a second time, but gave me some lemonade instead. My brother was very much amused, and talked about it as a good joke when we got home. But my father took it more seriously, and gave me sixpence as a reward! I don't think I deserved it, but "sixpence was sixpence" to a small boy in those days, and I thought it was "rather good business" to be a teetotaler at sixpence a time!

Soon after, my mother, who was an invalid, had a glass of stout poured out for her dinner; and out of mischief, when she was not looking, I tried to make her pet dog drink some. But he turned his head away, and wouldn't touch it; and I remember the thought crossing my mind that if he wouldn't, neither should I.

Later on again, I saw a poor drunken woman lying in the mud, and it so filled me with horror that again I made up my mind I would never touch the drink. I was only eight years old, but during the thirty odd years I have lived since then, I have never seen any reason to alter my mind, and hundreds of times I have thanked God for the object lessons I learned in those early days, both for my own sake and as an example for the sake of others.

Years after, when I was studying at Cambridge, I used to visit many public-houses on Sunday evenings with tracts, and invited the people into a Gospel meeting, into which sometimes sixty or seventy would come, direct out of these dreadful places in which I saw some very terrible sights. One night a man said: "It's all very well, young man, for you to come here and want us to give up our beer; but I expect you like your glass of wine in your college rooms." You can imagine how glad I was to be able to say: "No, I never touch it. If I did, I couldn't ask you to give it up;" and I realized once more that if I was ever to be of any use in the world, or do any real good among poor, degraded people, I must keep clear of strong drink myself. And that is why I ask you to do the same.

Dear young people, I have tried hard, during the years we have had these occasional talks together, to inspire you with the ambition to make your lives worth living—lives of true happiness to yourselves, and of blessing and usefulness to those around you; and certainly one way of doing so is to become teetotalers while you are young; when it is quite easy to do so, because you have not formed the habit of drinking, which in older people is so much harder to give up. "For your own sake" and "For the sake of others" are the two great foundation-stones upon which the beautiful temple of Temperance stands.

It reminds me of a lady who wanted to engage a coachman; and, desiring a really good and careful driver she asked one how near a precipice he could drive in safety. He replied, "Two yards, madam." "And how near could you drive?" she asked a second. "One yard, madam," he answered. To the same question a third replied, "I would rather keep as far from the edge as possible, my lady." She very wisely decided that he would be the safest man to have; so she engaged him. The application of that little lesson I am sure you can make for yourselves.

May I add a further word against a very common and easy sin, namely, to laugh at drunken persons? If you think of the grief it must be to our Heavenly Father when those who are "made in the image of God" become degraded and sodden with drink, and of the sorrow it brings upon their homes and little children, I am sure you will realize how displeasing it is to Him to make them the subjects of ridicule and mirth. "Fools make a mock at sin" (Prov. xiv. 9), but "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Psa. cxi. 10). Therefore "abstain from all appearance (or, every form, R.V.) of evil" (1 Thess. v. 22).

Looking at temperance in a wider sense, we may also learn that it is equally desirable to exercise total abstinence in regard to other temptations that lead to bad habits, such as (in the case of boys especially) swearing, lying, cheating—and even gambling, because that is more of a temptation than it used to be. Will you older boys guard against these things, remembering the saying: "Sow a habit, and you reap a character; sow a character, and you reap a destiny"? Habits are like lion-cubs, very small at first, and apparently harmless, but by degrees they grow into strong and terrible foes that "turn again and rend you."

God help you to follow His banner,
And serve Him wherever you go;
And when you are tempted, my brother,
God give you the grace to say, NO!

The World for Christ (Matt. xxviii. 16-20).

THESE words contain our marching orders. It is not for us to reason or ask questions, but to do as our Saviour bids us.

There are two memorable mountains in our Lord's life which look towards each other across the valley trodden by those holy feet. The first was the mountain of Temptation, where Satan offered Him the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them, if He would fall down and worship him. The tempter said that the authority in them was his, and that he could give it to whomsoever he chose. But our Lord refused to entertain the subtle offer. He would not do wrong to gain power. He would not swerve right or left from the path which His Father had marked out for Him, even though it led straight to the cross.

He was crucified in weakness. As He hung on the cross the Tempter may have suggested that He had thrown away a great opportunity. And what if the Father should fail Him! But our Lord went down into the grave, animated by a supreme faith. He knew that He would issue from it, as a corn of wheat issues again with an hundredfold of profit.

Now from this second mountain, ere He ascends to heaven, the Master tells us that all His anticipations have been fulfilled. He had poured out His soul unto death, had been numbered with the transgressors; now He was to divide the portion with the great, and the spoil with the strong. Because He had, as the Lamb of God, put away sin by His blood, He was counted worthy, as the enthroned Lamb, to take the scroll of empire, and unfold it seal by seal (Rev. v.).

What a marvellous comfort is stored in these words! The Lord's authority extends to heaven, He is greater than angels, and mightier than all the power of the Adversary. And to earth there is no shore, no territory, no people over which He has not an incontestable claim. It is His earth now, since He has won it back to God out of the hands of the devil. We need not hesitate to erect His standard wherever we land; we are only taking possession of that which is already His. This is our message to men, "Know that this land and you belong by right to the Redeemer; we come to tell you of that mighty fact, and summon you to admit His claims."

What an encouragement this is for us to go forth! "All authority hath been given Me . . . Go ye therefore." Let us believe this. Let us act in unwavering faith that it is so. Then, as we advance, doors will fly open, hearts will answer, governments and magistrates will make way, Nature herself will speed us forward, and nothing shall be able to withstand the open sesame of the Name of Christ. The more entirely we believe this, and act on it, the more marvellous will be the results in our experience. Let us not look at our own ingenuity or power of persuasion to secure for ourselves an entrance into all the world, but go forward in the might of Jesus Christ. We must not be governed by appearances, but by a mighty and simple faith.

Notice what has to be done. We are to make disciples, who shall be learners at the feet of Jesus. Our best work is to bring men to Him, and leave them there. We are to urge them to confess and identify themselves with Him, which is the underlying thought of Baptism. (Note the one name of the three persons of the Trinity.) We are to teach all things that He has commanded.

He is with us, all the days (the literal rendering of the Greek). In bright and dark days, in what seem days of disappointment and failure equally as in days of mighty success. Count on His co-operation, rely on His direction and guidance, go in His company!

"My Cup Runneth Over."

God's eye is ever on us,
Not only where the sun
In beauty shines upon us,
But when the day is done.
When, in her silver glory,
The moon shines bright aloft,
With myriad stars around her,
Shedding a radiance soft.

Yes, He is ever watchful,
He sees each smile and tear;
'Twas He that sent the brightness,
When all seemed dark and drear.
Oh! faithful, loving Master!
How thankful I should be!
For Thou dost send the mercies
Which every day I see.

Thou art the One that carest
When others seem to jeer;
With Thee, my God, beside me,
I cannot ever fear.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, December 7.

Ruth and Naomi (Ruth i. 16-22).
Golden Text (Rom. xii. 10).

THE book of Ruth supplies an important link in the genealogy of David, and through him of "David's greater Son" (Ruth iv. 18-22; Matt. i. 5, 6, 16).

From Moab to Bethlehem-Ephratah, the birthplace of Jesus (Micah v. 2), was a rough, difficult, and dangerous journey of about fifty miles.

After Deut. iv. 40 it seemed lack of faith on Elimelech's part to flee into a heathen land at the time of famine. He did not prosper. Compare with Lot (Gen. xix. 15). Naomi was in the path of duty to go with her husband, but takes blame to herself. "The Lord testified against me;" "I went out;" the Lord brought me home again. In other words Psa. cxix. 67.

Naomi's Influence and Reward.

The beauty of her character is shown in her influence over her daughters-in-law. Both loved her; one was "almost," the other "altogether" persuaded to become a believer in the God of Israel. Love for the sons of Naomi and the mutual sorrows of widowhood had bound the three women together. Verse 7 shows the self-sacrifice in her mother-love, and 9-14 her wisdom in counsel (ii. 23, iii. 1), her motherly care over Ruth while they lived in Bethlehem. Her unselfish love was rewarded—a haven of rest for her declining years in the godly home of the rich kinsman, husband to the daughter who loved her, and a grandchild to fill her empty arms.

In the land of promise where God was worshipped.

Orpah and Ruth.

Orpah, with face turned towards her old home, and a life of pleasure among her old companions, possibly a prosperous remarriage (many would have said hers was the most sensible choice), but "without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12).

Ruth (like Moses Heb. xi. 25) turned her back on old home and idols and an equal chance of remarriage to comfort and help a lonely, sad-hearted, poor and aged woman; to go with her into an unknown land among a strange people. But sheltered under the wings of the Lord God of Israel (ii. 12). Lacked she anything? A mother's loving care, a warm welcome from her adopted people, and the blessing of the Lord, married a rich kinsman, became the great-grandmother of King David, and an ancestress of the Son of God.

Ruth's Character.

Loving, gentle, firm, steadfast, earnest, devoted, obedient, grateful, true-hearted, unselfish, self-sacrificing, industrious. When once she had cast in her lot with the people of God nothing could move her. When she came to Bethlehem she sought to earn her own and her mother's living, and the Lord blessed her in her work.

Lessons.

1. Was the journey into Moab a wrong course, ill-advised, taken without seeking guidance of the Lord? (Psa. cvi. 13.) Trouble often comes upon us as the result of our own self-will.

2. If the path of duty leads us into worldly surroundings the Lord can enable us to live such a winsome life of faith in Him that souls will be won for Jesus.

3. Orpah and Ruth had the same teacher, same opportunity of learning about God, and choosing His service. Orpah was "not far from the kingdom," but Ruth stepped in.

4. Life's resolves, what are they? To become rich, clever, grand, noted, important, popular, a great discoverer, traveller, inventor? Ruth's choice was the noblest.

Thy God my God (Psa. cxviii. 28).
Thy people my people (Heb. xi. 25).
Thy Word my delight (Psa. i. 2).
Thy law my guide (Psa. cxix. 10).
Thy cause my joy (Phil. ii. 18).
Thy glory my aim (1 Cor. x. 31).
Thy home my home (John xiv. 2, 3).

A NOTABLE DECISION.

There may be seen near Hayes, in Kent, a seat which is notable from the fact that it marks the spot of a famous decision. It was there that William Wilberforce, resting with William Pitt, determined that he would devote his life to the praiseworthy object of the abolishment of slavery. Long did Wilberforce combat the iniquity in Parliament, and repeatedly was he beaten. It took nearly twenty years to abolish the heinous trade, and during that time a few staunch friends of the slaves continued the agitation. It was a memorable determination of Ruth to give up her land and her heathen gods. In saying to Naomi "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God" (v. 16), she was in reality placing herself at the service of the Lord. Through her we trace the descent of David, and through him of David's greater Son, the Mighty Deliverer of Israel from her slavery of sin.

A FAITHFUL FRIEND.

It is related that a gentleman, attached to the suite of the King of Greece, was once on a steamer accompanied by his dog. The animal fell overboard and the captain was asked to stop the vessel. He absolutely declined to do so, and added that only in the case of a man being overboard would he slacken the speed of the ship. In order to save his dog, the owner at last plunged into the sea, and the captain was then compelled to lower a boat, in which both the dog and its faithful master were rescued. Love for a dumb animal may be great; love for a fellow creature is far greater. "Where thou diest," said Ruth, "will I die: the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part thee and me" (v. 17). If our affection is far above that of dumb animals, how wonderful must be the love of God toward us? While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

A STEADFAST MIND.

Dean Farrar has said that the secret of his strength in life is the fact that he has never done that which he himself wished, but has been steadfastly minded to do as God wished. He adds: "During the last thirty-six years God has twelve times changed my home, and fifteen times changed my work. I have scarcely done what I myself would have chosen." At the crossroads of life we should allow God to point the way, and He has promised to keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Him. When Naomi saw that Ruth was steadfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto her (v. 18). "A good man's heart," says the Psalmist, "is fixed, trusting in the Lord; his heart is established." May we, therefore, be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.

The Alliance Club.

THE Alliance Club for Christian ladies has already been joined by many earnest and spiritually-minded women, but a substantial increase in its present membership is desirable, in order to place it on a thoroughly satisfactory footing.

The primary object of the Club is, of course, to provide its members with a town house in a central position, where they can rest in the intervals of shopping or meetings, can meet and entertain their friends, obtain meals or light refreshments at moderate charges, and engage bedrooms when required. But the promoters of the Alliance Club desire not merely to provide for the material comfort of members, but to make it a centre of Christian effort and influence; giving opportunities of congenial intercourse to those engaged in different branches of the Lord's work and furthering that work in every way that comes within the legitimate scope of a club.

A ladies' club, conducted on out-and-out Christian principles in the West End of London, witnesses by its very existence to the reality and power of the Gospel in a centre of fashion and frivolity, and therefore needs and deserves the hearty support of all who realise how far-reaching its influence may become. The basis of membership itself, with which inquirers about the club are necessarily confronted, has been the means of bringing Scripture teaching as to the way of salvation in a forcible manner before many who ignore or reject it. It has occasioned some striking opportunities for personal dealing with souls.

We therefore desire to impress upon all who, by their principles and circumstances are in a position to become members, that, even if they have no personal need for the conveniences of the club, they should yet join it themselves, and endeavour to enlist new members with a view to maintaining and increasing its usefulness to others and to the Kingdom of Christ. Men and women of the world compete eagerly for admission to those clubs whose membership confers a stamp of mental or social distinction. May Christian ladies be equally keen to identify themselves with one which openly takes up its position on the Lord's side, and seeks the higher distinction of witnessing and ministering unto Him.

Prospectuses and application forms can be had by applying to the secretary, Alliance Club, 37, Clarges Street, Piccadilly.

Mr. W. R. Lane's Missions.

HUDDERSFIELD.

THAT historic sanctuary, Salendine Nook Baptist Church, Huddersfield, has been the centre of a fruitful mission, conducted by Mr. W. R. Lane. The Free Churches in the district of Longwood, Lindley, and Outlane united. Mr. Lane began on Saturday, October 25, when he met the workers and delivered an instructive address on "Sowing and Reaping." The following day he preached in the morning, conducted a united service for young people in the afternoon, and preached again in the evening, the minister, Rev. J. Witton Jenkins, assisting.

Good congregations came together each evening and listened with great attention to the telling addresses delivered. On Friday, the 31st ult., Mr. Lane gave his lecture on "Bunyan and the Pilgrim's Progress," exhibiting fifty very beautiful limelight views. It was, however, on the second Sunday that we began to see the effect of the mission. In the morning the large chapel was well filled. In the afternoon the men's meeting was a sight not to be forgotten. Sixteen miles in the district were flooded with cards of invitation, which brought out a congregation of typical Yorkshire men, and Mr. Lane delivered a manly address with power.

In the evening the chapel was again full and the missioner had a grand time of it, but it was the final meeting on the Monday evening that crowned the mission. Some time before 7.30 the chapel was crowded, mostly with men. Just before the service commenced a striking scene was witnessed. The minister, who had gone to the door, returned with a dozen men who had come direct from the mill in their clogs and smocks, and got them seated close to the pulpit. Others in the same garb were to be seen among the congregation. It was a splendid service, and many went into the inquiry room. On Friday, November 14, Mr. Lane paid a return visit. Early in the evening he met inquirers and workers at a social in the schoolroom of the chapel. Over 200 came together, and Mr. Lane delivered an earnest address. Later, a public service was held in the chapel, and others were gathered in. Many have decided for Christ as the result of this mission, and Mr. Lane's visit has been a great blessing to the churches. C.

BURNLEY.

Mr. Lane has concluded a ten days' mission in Burnley for the Free Church Council. It was his first visit to the town. The meeting for Christian workers was well attended on the first Saturday evening. At that meeting Mr. Lane captured the affections of the Council and those present. On Sunday afternoon (November 9) he spoke to over 1,100 men at the largest P.S.A. in the town. It was a great meeting and prophetic of good to come. The first Sunday evening service was held after the regular public worship in the churches, and though a large congregation nearly filled Brunswick Chapel, it was generally felt that to put the mission service so late in the day was fair neither to the minister nor the missioner. The attendance at the week evening services grew steadily.

On Sunday, the 16th, Mr. Lane preached for the President of the Council in Hollingreave Congregational Church. In the afternoon the Opera House, which seats 2,500, was too small for the crowd who gathered to hear an address to men only. It was an impressive sight, and the Holy Spirit was present in power. Men held their breath as Mr. Lane spoke on "The Trinity of Evil," and at the close there was such a demonstration as is seldom witnessed even at political meetings. In the evening the Opera House was again filled by seven o'clock, and the missioner had a rare opportunity when he spoke on "The Love of God." At the close of the address an after meeting was held in Bethesda Church, and nearly 600 persons were present. This was the crowning service of the day, and over seventy indicated their desire to trust Christ for salvation. On Monday night, at the closing meeting of the mission, Mr. Lane spoke on his conversion, and from this meeting hundreds were turned away, while over 2,000 persons were packed into Brunswick U.M.F. Church. At this service over a hundred gave in their names as anxious inquirers or as converts, and many others went away under deep conviction.

The missioner has left a deep impression behind him. His message was just what Burnley needed to hear. Its strong ethical note and its deep and fervid evangelicalism at once impressed the Christian and non-Christian hearers. His loyalty to Christ crucified, and his insistence on the application of the teaching of Christ in places where men live, in business, citizenship, recreation, education, church life, home culture, the marriage relations, the dealings of men with men, induced men (and men more generally than women) and women to accept Christ Himself. Humanly speaking, if Mr. Lane could have stayed for another ten days, the whole town might have been set on fire for God. As it is, the ministers hope to carry on the good work in their churches. D. Q. S.

Gunnersbury, W.

Mr. E. P. Telford has just concluded an encouraging mission at the Gunnersbury Baptist Church, of which Rev. H. B. Murray is pastor. Originally intended for a fortnight, the mission was extended a week longer, and though the meetings have not been crowded on the week-nights, yet a good deal of blessing has been seen, especially among the younger people who have attended. Nearly 100 passed through the inquiry-room, being carefully dealt with by experienced workers. Mr. Telford's clear, incisive preaching was appreciated by the Lord's people, who have been greatly helped by his ministry, and many have become earnest in the work of gathering in the unsaved to listen to the Word preached. We rejoiced at seeing so many quietly but assuredly taking upon themselves the name of Christ, and acknowledging Him as their Lord. A gathering of the young converts is to be held this week. C. C.

The Shaftesbury Institute, N.W.

A ten days' mission—from Sunday, November 2, till Tuesday, 11—has been conducted by Miss Huxtable, in our Mission Hall, with very encouraging results. On the first Sunday evening Miss Huxtable gave the account of her own conversion, first from infidelity to Unitarianism, and then, through the instrumentality of Mrs. Baeyertz (the converted Jewess), after long weeks of darkness, she was brought into the light, and "to the knowledge of the truth."

The story, though a remarkable one, was perhaps more suitable for an educated audience than for the very ignorant and uneducated class we are working among, who could scarcely enter into her experience; but Miss Huxtable has a clear and forcible way of putting the Gospel, and a strong conviction of the power of the word of God, as "a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces."

She was very earnest in pleading with all to accept what might be "the last message" for some. So it proved to be for one. On the first Tuesday night, in response to the invitation, one of the men in our Labour Home was the first to rise and go into the inquiry room. God used her words to convince him of his need of a Saviour, and that night we believe he "passed from death unto life." Next evening, in answer to our question, "I see it all, I've got it all," he said, "and I'll stay behind to-morrow; it may induce some of the others to do the same." He was our "truckman"—his work was to deliver the firewood made in the Home, and up till Saturday, the 8th, he did his work as usual, and next day (Sunday) he attended all the services and mission hall meeting in the evening. At 3.30 a.m. he called to the man sleeping next him that he was cold and numb; the labour master was called, and ere the nearest doctor arrived he had become unconscious; it was a stroke of apoplexy. He lingered till 9.30 that evening, and just as we closed our mission meeting he was translated from the Labour Home to the eternal Home of Rest. An impressive funeral service was conducted by Rev. Dr. Hanson in our mission hall.

We had "droppings" on each night of the mission, but this event—so evidently sent of God—produced a deep impression on all, and the heart would be hard indeed that could resist the deeply solemn warning and earnest, tender pleading of the lady evangelist. On Monday night three men, besides women and girls remained behind. But the last was the "harvest" night. During the singing of the last hymn, it was a solemn moment, when those who did not wish to decide for Christ, who refused the offer of mercy, were asked to leave the room, many felt they dared not go out, and more than half the people stayed for the "after meeting." Then those who had already decided were asked to rise and remain standing, while those who wished to follow their example were asked to stand by them. The three men rose and five others followed; some of the "mothers," more than half the girls of the Training Home, and some factory girls.

Among those who waited for the "after meeting" was a young man from one of the roughest common lodging-houses; he was once an earnest Christian, but had been led away by companions to drink and the gambling table. He seemed deeply in earnest as he prayed aloud. The next night he returned, and he told me, in answer to my question, that he had knelt down in the public dormitory, amid the jeers and scoffs of the other inmates of the lodging-house.

Mrs. Baeyertz at Anstruther.

In response to an invitation signed by six ministers, Mrs. Baeyertz began her mission here on Sunday, November 2, in the Town Hall. During the week, when the evangelist continued her meetings in Cellardyke Parish Church, the same power was manifest, and each night anxious seekers remained behind to have the Word of God revealed to them.

The meetings of the second week were conducted in the Chalmers Memorial U.F. Church. The attendance was excellent, and on the last week night, people began to gather outside the church an hour and a half before the stated time of service, and when the church gates were opened, so great was the crush that many were actually lifted off their feet, while others were hurt in their attempts to get inside the church.

As the mission continued, the interest deepened and spread in all directions, and before the mission closed 325 seekers had been dealt with, and led to rest in the Word of God.

Not since the revival of 1860 has Anstruther been so moved, nor have so many non-church-goers and unconverted been seen eagerly assembling to hear the Gospel preached. Nor will those wayward ones easily forget the power with which the Word of God penetrated to the heart of saved and unsaved alike, and stirred within the soul a longing for a deeper knowledge of God.

One woman who had never been to the meetings was so deeply convicted through reading one of Mrs. Baeyertz's addresses that she came to the house where the evangelist was staying early in the morning and absolutely refused to leave without seeing her, and was led to rest in God's word. Whole families were converted.

The blessing was not confined to this district alone. The fishermen, although absent at Lowestoft, Yarmouth, and at sea, have been partakers with us, for their letters from wives and daughters were so full of their new-found joy in Christ that it led them to wish for the same Saviour, and we hear of one unconverted fisherman, who was so aroused that he got one of Mrs. Baeyertz's books, and through the reading of the addresses he too found the Saviour. Sixteen of the fishing boats returned on the last day of the mission, and the men sent a message through one of the ministers, asking Mrs. Baeyertz to prolong her visit, but having other engagements she was unable to do this.

Christian Work in the Army.

A few weeks ago the writer, at a meeting of military chaplains, heard the senior Wesleyan chaplain of the South African Field Force give it as his opinion that there were more Christian men in our Army on its return from the Front than was the case at the beginning of the war. We were therefore confidently expecting that a visit to Woolwich from Mr. Josiah Nix would prove a rich harvest-time in the salvation of many of our comrades. Such, indeed, has been the case. In common with our civilian friends the military workers have had the joy of pointing their penitent comrades to the Saviour, and many have found peace in believing.

After the mission, an invitation was given to all military converts to a tea at the Soldiers' Home, William Street. At the meeting immediately following an address was given on whole-hearted consecration. Opportunities were then afforded for testimony. The first to speak was a bright young fellow of the Royal Field Artillery, whose cheery Christian life has proved a great blessing to his room mates. Driver F. Rowe's influence in his room is acknowledged on all sides, and he has been the means of leading many older soldiers to Christ. Army Scripture Reader Walker told us that he was the happiest man in Woolwich, for he was witnessing signs of God's presence wherever he went. Men who had at times looked askance at him had now told him how they had been looking forward to his visits. A sergeant of the Royal Field Artillery admitted that he had found drink to be a stumbling block; but three weeks previously he had signed the pledge, and ten days later after, saying at a temperance meeting, "I am not yet a Christian, but I mean to be!" was so startled at his own confession that he went straight off home and gave himself fully to Christ.

Pensioners now engaged in the Arsenal and working overtime dropped in on the way home, and cheered their comades with their testimony bearing, and all realized God's presence. Space forbids quoting the greater portion of what we heard. Though late in breaking up, we had a verse of the "Roll-Call," and when at last there was a reluctant movement towards the doorway it was found that soldier lads had come in expressly to give their hearts to Christ. It need hardly be said that there were ready comrades at hand to point the way. To God be all the praise! D. K.

For some months past there has been an evident working of the Holy Spirit at the Baptist Church at West Drayton, Middlesex, manifested in the meetings for prayer for deepening the spiritual life, and the increasing numbers attending the Sunday meetings. The ten days' mission conducted by Pastors Percy J. Smart and E. W. Stenlake have been used of God both for awakening and strengthening. Deep impressions were made, and several came out boldly on the Lord's side.

[Owing to pressure on our space, much evangelistic news is held over, including reports of missions at Greenock, Crewe, Hornsea, New North Road, N., Newcastle-on-Tyne, Falkirk, and other places.]

About Books.

PUBLICATIONS ABOUT SOUTH AFRICA.

MANY memories remain of the gracious working of the Holy Spirit during the years of the recent war, and a permanent interest attaches to such memorials as are furnished by the South Africa General Mission, 17, Homefield Road, Wimbledon, S.W. In Echoes of Service from the Battlefields of South Africa (2s. 6d.), Mr. Dudley Kidd has traced in deeply interesting fashion the efforts put forth among the soldiers. Beginning with a reference to the mission work in Johannesburg during the days of the Jameson Raid, then with the declaration of war, the names of the great camps and battles come under notice from a point of view altogether different from that of the newspaper correspondent. It is a simple story of the leading by God of His servants into avenues of usefulness, the outcome of which forms a bright spot in the record of the dark time the nation is now trying to forget. While other bands of workers are left to tell their own stories, the warmest feelings are expressed towards them; and altogether the book will commend itself to believers as a profoundly instructive record of the using of a terrible time of conflict to win followers for the Prince of Peace.

Among minor publications the booklets in one series give the history of what was done at particular camps or of striking episodes, those of a second describe missionary work among natives, a third contains a number of valuable spiritual messages (½d. and 1d. each), and a series of hymns and other leaflets will be found more useful for enclosing in letters (4d. per dozen). The illustrations are excellent, and the general get-up most attractive.

Songs of Hope and Courage. By Jessie Annie Anderson. (Aberdeen: Milne & Stephen.) A booklet of choice verse.

In Flora's Realm is a grand book. It tells the story of Flowers, Fruit, and Leaves, as that can be so admirably done by Edward Step, F.L.S. There are over 130 illustrations, a number of them coloured plates, and all of them helpful. (3s. 6d. Nelsons.)

The British College Christian Union has added to the series of Scripture manuals a volume entitled Helps to the Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews (1s.) by Henry T. Hodgkin, M.A., M.B. Much thought and care have been brought to the work, which students will find of real service. After each divisional lesson there is space for additional notes.

Fifty-Two Cheery Chats for Wives and Mothers. From the German of Margarette von Hochfeld. (2s. 6d. net. Houlston & Sons.) Here are Sunday readings for a year. They attracted much attention when originally published in a German periodical, and it is hoped that they will prove helpful in some English homes. A refined candour runs through the pages, which are both instructive and entertaining.

For a generation or more The Golden Grain Almanack has been with us; and again it is issued in several forms. There are cloth editions at 6d.; both in pocket size interleaved, and in large type. The Golden Grain Almanack and Diary (1s. 6d. net) bound in roan with tuck pockets, &c., is an old friend, serving a practical purpose, and at the same time putting us in remembrance regarding spiritual things. (J. E. Hawkins.)

The Gentle Art of Making Happy, by George H. Morrison, M.A. (1s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier), is a precious little book. If its intimations were in common exercise, we should have "heaven begun below." Other chapters in this thoughtful book include, "On the Deep Significance of the Usual" (suggested by Luke xvi. 30, 31), and "On the Sweet Doctrine of the Second Mile" (suggested by Matt. v. 41).

The Revival Call to the Churches. By William Woods Smyth. (6d. net. Partridge.) We welcome a second edition (fourth thousand) of this stirring booklet. There has been many calls in recent years; but none is so fully justified by the condition of the churches, and none so easy of vindication in Holy Scripture, as is that which echoes the inspired prayer: "O Lord, revive Thy work." We trust many will read, and be helped by this timely word.

Holy Sentences for Every Day in Eight Languages is a compilation that has engaged the head and heart of Miss Russell, of Chenies, and it will assuredly be welcomed with joy in many a home. After the date on each page is a motto-text in eight languages—Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, German, French and English. Approved texts and versions have been followed throughout, and the printing has been carried through with care and elegance. (4s. 6d. Operative Jewish Converts' Institution, Palestine House, Bodney Road, Hackney Downs, N.E.)

Under the title of Gospel Messages for the People, Pastor F. E. Marsh gives us the substance of evangelistic addresses delivered at the People's Palace, Sunderland. Pithy and anecdotal, and well calculated to arrest the attention of the unconverted, the addresses are at the same time soundly Scriptural. (9d. net. Marshall Brothers.)

Among the attractive Scriptural publications of the Alpha Card Publishing Co. (54, Hillfield Avenue, Hornsey, N.) we have noted as specially useful tear-off block calendars, one on the International Lessons, also "The Christian's," and "Our Daily Grace," accompanied by the "Go Forward" six-page turnover calendar (1s. each). A variety of floral and other pretty illuminated Christmas cards (at 6d. and 1s. per packet) will serve to remind little ones and older friends of the love and grace of God in salvation. The texts have been thoughtfully selected.

A peculiar fragrance characterizes a little book bearing the long title, Memories of Scottish Scenes and Sabbaths More Than Eighty Years Ago; or Sketches of Religious Life among the Peasantry of Ayrshire Early in the Nineteenth Century. By the late Rev. Alex. Kennedy, Dunbarton, Ontario. (1s. net. Andrew Elliot, 17, Princes Street, Edinburgh.) The pages are reprinted from the Canadian United Presbyterian Magazine of forty years ago, and they are edited with preface and a few explanatory footnotes by Rev. J. K. Scott, B.D., Fraserburgh.

Messrs. Gould & Co. have published a number of new sacred and other songs, &c., for the present season. Among those deserving to become popular are F. W. Sparrow's setting to The Fairest Flower, by Rev. F. A. Aylward (4s.); Memories of the Heart, by Rev. W. Johnson, with violin and 'cello accompaniments (4s.); Angelo Mascheroni's music to A. H. Hyatt's inspiring messsage, The Hope of Years (4s.); The Gift of Peace—words by Edward Oxenford, music by Chas. Fogg—(4s.); and, what is destined to be a favourite duet, For All Eternity, another of Mascheroni's compositions (4s.). A pleasant and melodious duet for the violin and piano is An Eastern Serenade, by Albert Fox (3s.); while aspiring organists will welcome Book III. of Celebrated Marches, transcribed for the organ by C. R. Griffiths. (1s. 6d.).

The Christian Church and the Lord's Day is a telling tract by Dr. F. Peake, secretary of the Lord's Day Observance Society (6s. per 100. Office, 20, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.)

Wiclif's Anti-War Views: An Obstructed or Nearly Suppressed Ray from "The Morning Star of the Reformation," that should now Shed Forth its Light. By Josiah W. Leeds. (Friends' Tract Association). The second edition of a deeply interesting pamphlet.

The Coronation Thanksgiving, "Crowned in the Nation's Heart," is a booklet for the present time, by Rev. Charles Bullock. It gives an interesting account of the Coronation ceremony, with timely and wholesome reflections. (2d. "Home Words" Office.)

Mr. J. H. Jeheber, 28, Rue du Marché, Geneva, has issued in booklet form a series of brief meditations by Rev. F. B. Meyer, sympathetically translated into French by Mme. B. Escande. The issues before us, in attractive lithographed wrappers, include Ou est la Faute? Que Faire de nos Fardeaux? Le Secret de la Victoire, and Le Secret de la Force. (15 centimes each; 10 frs. per 100.)

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—I understand that my name is being publicly quoted:—(1) As being opposed to the Education Bill, and (2) as having been present at the Albert Hall on November 14, and opposing the Kenyon-Slaney Amendment.

I beg to state, therefore, that from the the time of its introduction, I felt sure that the Bill, though apparently then full of danger to the Protestant cause, was capable of such amendment as would make it a most valuable measure. I hailed, therefore, with delight Colonel Kenyon-Slaney's Amendment, and purposely stayed away from the Albert Hall meeting when I learned that the general tone of the speeches was likely to be in opposition to that amendment.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. W. Webb-Peploe.

25, Onslow Gardens, S.W.

"UNWISE CHARITY."

DEAR SIR,—Under the above heading, in your issue of November 6, you protested against universal pensions to the aged poor in this country.

To say nothing of the difficulty—or rather impossibility—of accurately discriminating between the thrifty and thriftless (it would fail even with an army of 10,000 inquisitors), I plead for the principle of Grace, of which your paper surely is an exponent—in other words mercy to the undeserving, as the keynote for any national and rational plan of dealing with the problem. The thriftless are usually those upon whom temptation has fallen with tremendous force, and whose power to resist has been weakened, whether from heredity, or from faulty upbringing, or from evil surroundings, or from ill success in the struggle for existence. Charity, in the best sense of the word, is rarely, if ever, unwise.—Yours truly,

James E. Mathieson.

Special Number Next Week. Our next issue will be one of special interest. We hope to give a survey of leading societies in the Metropolis concerned with the practical side of Christianity—in caring for the Lord's poor and needy ones.

An Offer to Our Readers. On page 12 is a special announcement by our publishers concerning the gift of The Topical Bible, under conditions there set forth. We hope a large number of our readers will avail themselves of this opportunity to obtain free of cost a copy of this handsome and useful work.

A Great Incentive to Service. The blessing that has come to Christian workers through the reading of the Life of D. L. Moody will not soon be told. A minister writes to us from Yorkshire :—

I think if extracts were read from Mr. Moody's life at our week-night services, the book would be made a great blessing to our church members. I pity the man or woman that could read, or hear it read, without being constrained to serve the Master.

The work of the great evangelist remains with us in various forms. His life-example and stimulus are also calculated to help many who would have a part in the toil of God's harvest-field. (5s. Morgan & Scott.)

Dr. Torrey. We have received a number of communications from friends desiring the services of Dr. Torrey. At the earliest possible moment these will be laid before him; and that the meetings which follow may be characterized by Divine power and blessing, is the earnest and continued prayer of Christian workers throughout the land. Dr. Torrey is expected to reach England in the first week of January, and we hope in due course to give particulars of the meetings as arranged.

Temperance and Foreign Missions. Last Sunday was specially devoted to two very important objects. Thousands of temperance sermons were preached throughout the land in all churches, and in the Church of England the day was one of special intercession on behalf of foreign missions. The latter is very significant, coming as it does as part of that revival of interest in the Great Commission which is so strikingly manifest at the present moment. But this one day's work must be followed up. There would be no need for a Temperance Sunday if the whole life of the Church and nation were lifted up to a higher level. This is the thing to aim at supremely. And so with foreign missions. The ideal to seek is not less than that the whole Church shall become imbued with a Divine compassion for human souls, whether pagan or civilized. At present missionary enterprise is described as an "auxiliary." We must not rest until evangelization becomes a ruling passion with us. And to this end all sermons should be ultimately directed.

Withholding the Tithes. A minister, well known in the north of England, in referring to his adventures as a pleader on behalf of a great home mission, mentioned two cases of failure to obtain anything like substantial help from men who were leading members of his own denomination. The one, who was on the eve of spending £200,000 upon the purchase of an estate, contributed, after much haggling, the munificent sum of £20 towards the biggest enterprise his church had ever undertaken in forward work, and which demanded help to the amount of a quarter of a million of money. The other, after remarking that his "pleasure bill" cost him upon the average £1,000 a year, gave a donation of £5. And then men wonder why God's work does not prosper! It is true, as in the days of Haggai the prophet, that men build and decorate their own ceiled houses, while the house of the Lord lies waste. Not until this question of proportionate giving is settled, will the windows of heaven be opened and an unparalleled blessing be poured out.

Boom in Amusements. To an extent quite unusual for the weeks immediately preceding Christmas, the London theatres are reaping a golden harvest. Last week seventeen West-End houses took more than £25,000, and a similar amount also represents the advance bookings for seats at a single pantomime. It is explained that :—

After the tension of the years of war, the inevitable reaction has set in. In every class of society there is the same craving for amusement. For the serious play, the play with a moral purpose, there is, apparently, at present no demand. One or two of promise have been produced, but the manager in each case has speedily had to regret his temerity. "Entertainment" is the cry!

All this is quite in keeping with the spirit of the times, and sheds instructive light upon the professional assertions as to the uplifting influences of the stage. But it also reveals a shameless selfishness on the part of society in the Metropolis, in rushing after its own amusement while such abnormal suffering is rife among the poor.

Where Starvation begins. A daily contemporary, in a thoughtful leader with regard to the probability of a severe winter in these islands, and to the large numbers already out of work, urges the need of preparation in good time to deal with the attendant misery. Practical sympathy is, happily, generally forthcoming for the aged and the children in such times of distress, but our contemporary has done wisely in warning the public against dependence upon that spasmodic charity which in so many cases comes too late, and in urging that the means of succour should be taken well in hand "if we intend to go through the severe season without loss of life and silent suffering worse than war can produce." The writer certainly goes straight to the point in saying :—

Starvation kills long before its victim dies. The delicate child and the decrepit labourer or artisan are ofttimes beyond the reach of compassion and of help at the date when compassion has found out their straits. The mischief has been allowed to be done in those lost days when plans of assistance were not matured, and while honest poverty was trying to fight its own battles.

A Wise Provision. The increase of taxation, both direct and indirect, that has marked the last two years, has appreciably raised the average cost of living for all classes, and especially for the poorer classes. It is calculated that at present £1 will go only as far as 17s. 6d. a little while ago, which is a serious factor in the national life. It is clear, therefore, that the winter before us will be one of exceptional distress in town and country, and preparations are being accordingly entered upon in many centres to meet the calls that are sure to be made. It would be well if the example were followed of a suburban vicar, who has invited ministers and leaders of all the neighbouring churches to a conference, with a view to a common organization of forces, and especially in order to avoid needless overlapping. In this way one of the worst evils attendant on all charitable work will be prevented.

A Great Moral Victory. The signal triumph of Mr. Edwyn Holt, in his defence of the Watch Committee of Manchester for their attack on the management of a local theatre, is a great victory for the crusade which aims at purifying our places of amusement. The action brought against him by the manager in question, who claimed £5,000 damages, failed absolutely, the jury awarding an unhesitating verdict for Mr. Holt. A few more plucky and determined acts of this kind on the part of public men would go far to remedy the evils in question; and they deserve the gratitude of all interested in a purer social life. It calls for no small courage to attack a rooted system of vice of this kind, and the man who does so, often suffers for the time a kind of martyrdom. The issues at stake, however, make such a course well worth the risks involved, and, when victory rewards the effort, incalculable good is done.

The Responsibility of the Police. It would be well, too, if every town and city had a chief constable of the type of Mr. Peacock. Mr. Holt's work was rendered easier because of that official's policy since 1900. If we cannot make people good by the exercise of municipal authority, we can, at least, by that means remove the facilities which abound for making people bad.

The Lord Chief Justice on Betting. Our legal leaders are growing insistent on the evil consequences of the betting mania, and it is well that they do so, for their voices reach the classes that are deaf to all pulpit appeals. The Lord Chief Justice, in charging the grand jury at Lincoln, took occasion to deliver an incisive attack on the vice. He pointed out that betting prevails to a dreadful extent throughout the country, and he and other judges had constantly to observe how many cases of fraud, robbery, and embezzlement were a direct result of the miserable practice. While drink is still a prolific cause of crime, yet a very large proportion of the embezzlements by young people are to be traced to betting. He suggested to the grand jury that they should set themselves to devise some method of checking the evil. Some general action should certainly be taken towards this end, and the Betting Committee should be encouraged to look into the methods of prevention as well as cure in making up their report.

Hugh Price Hughes Memorial. A practical scheme, capable of great things, has been launched in connection with the West London Mission. "Sister Lily" writes from 60, Greek Street, Soho, W.:—

Many of your readers will have heard of the "West London Mission Memorial" to Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, which our circuit stewards have organized, as they feel sure that "the best tribute to his memory will be to secure and maintain in full vigour the work of the West London Mission," to which already £1,800 a year have been promised for three years.

Mr. Marden and I have been closely associated with Mr. Hughes in his work in the "after-meeting" at St. James' Hall for fifteen years; and we feel that there are none to whom this will come home with such sacred appeal as those who have been spiritually helped by the ministry of Mr. Hughes. There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of men and women all over the world, who were first led to Christ by him, and as many more were first led to active work in the Church. It is probable that the greater number of these will not be rich in this world's goods, but out of their limited means may be able to give or collect, say, from 10s. a year upwards for three years.

The Dean of Ripon. In a letter to the Bishop of Ripon, Dean Fremantle has made a statement which, while it explains his attitude towards Orthodoxy, invests his recent utterance and his writings for some years past, with many of the features of a riddle. The Dean declares that he says the Creeds "with triumphant voice"; and this will, to a large extent, disarm further criticism. If, however, a man believes from his heart that which Holy Scripture teaches regarding the Virgin Birth, the Miraculous Ministry, and the Glorious Resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, he can find small excuse, on moral or intellectual grounds, to question or cavil at these great doctrinal facts, these essential grounds of faith and hope. By excluding the mysteries of the Christian Faith, the modern critic strikes first at its Divine Founder. And then what can be said of a Saviour, and what of any provision on the part of the Creator for the redemption of the world?

Scripture, Criticism, and Faith. In these days of persistent and multiform attacks upon the historical and revealed basis of Christianity, and upon details and slight apparent discrepancies in the Word of God, the attitude taken by the late Dr. Luthardt, the eminent Professor of Theology at Leipzig, who has written many volumes upon the Scriptures, is one that may be taken with advantage by many Christians who are unwise enough to trouble themselves with a speculative Higher Criticism. Reviewing his life, and its happy peace in believing, Dr. Luthardt says:—

I never doubted the historic character of the statements of the New Testament. The critical attacks had, in this respect, made no deep impression upon me. I had become convinced that there was too much obstinacy and arbitrariness in these attacks. It seemed to me a poor method of procedure to make a specialty of discovering little discrepancies. Neither did difficulties in detail trouble me when I was certain respecting the sum and substance. If the substantials are settled, what care I for the pebbles in the way? If these cannot be removed, then let them lie, and pass round them. They do not block the way itself.

Æsthetics and Evangelism. Speaking recently at Oxford on "Work in Great Cities," the Bishop of London, after referring to the fascination and tenor of spiritual efforts in a huge Metropolis where "every eight minutes a soul left this world for eternity," and every year the population is increased by 40,000, Dr. Ingram said he anticipated abuse for "making the most and best of old disused City churches." The expectation apparently was well founded, for already some people are in arms in regard to the coming demolition of one of these buildings, Allhallows, Lombard Street, which for long had an absentee rector, and no congregation to speak of. The Bishop has, however, summed up the matter in remarking that:—

He had to balance in his mind the æsthetic value of the church, and the value of the building and its site, say £200,000, and he could not himself weigh the æsthetic value of the church against the possession of £200,000 to save souls.

As it now appears that only one in eighty of the population of London attends divine worship, it is evident that the need is pressing for the expenditure of large sums in effective mission-rooms and plain churches, and Dr. Ingram's argument appears unanswerable.

Parochial Visitation. Recent perverts, apparently having only a limited acquaintance with the official obligations of the priest, have been taking exception to the absence of parochial visitation in their districts, and a writer in the (Roman) Catholic Times instructs them that nowhere is it laid down in any directions of Synods, or of the Canon Law, that visiting is an obligation. Occasion is taken to sneer at the Protestant custom as "the medium for doling out the small subsidies by which the Anglican system maintains some sort of an attendance of the poor at church;" but the conclusion contains an unworthy innuendo, which is neither fair comment nor argument:—

Many priests, not as a matter of duty, but rather with an eye to the parochial balance-sheet, do visit their parishioners more or less, but it will be quite understood that they are more than ordinarily cautious in paying visits to single ladies.

A Pertinent Question. It is significant that the London vicar, against whom the Bishop of London is commencing proceedings in regard to the disobedient practices followed at St. Michael's, Shoreditch, has addressed a letter to the leading Roman Catholic journal protesting against such episcopal action, and offering an explanation as due to "those who think with me." According to Rev. Mr. Evans, the point is not the legality or otherwise of such practices as the Rosary, the Benediction of the Sacred Heart, &c., but of the right publicly to teach the doctrines they symbolize. If it is possible that there can exist any doubt upon this point, it certainly is desirable that it should be removed; but Mr. Evans does not receive much sympathy from the editor to whom he has appealed, who pertinently remarks:—

It certainly is singular to find an Anglican clergyman endeavouring to maintain as part of the creed of the Church of England doctrines which are so manifestly taken from us. The question at once suggests itself: Why does not Mr. Evans seek these truths by entering the Church from which they have been received?"

Plain Speaking. A series of valuable articles has been appearing in the Manchester Dispatch, dealing frankly with the question of efficiency in the administration of our national affairs. The last that we have seen, written by Mr. Arnold White, deals with the question of physical degeneracy, and how to remedy it. In chaste, yet terribly plain language, our failure in this respect is brought home to us. Asylum and slum records are made to teach their proper lesson, which is that, unless there is a speedy improvement in the conditions and habits of modern life in large cities, we are doomed, as a people, to physical decay. Mr. White reminds us that Queen Victoria's two jubilees (and he might have added the King's Coronation) were chiefly marked by collections to relieve disease. Beautiful as is this mark of philanthropy, there is something better, and that is, the prevention of disease. While our legislators are forcing through unpopular measures, the real vital questions of life, upon which the country's prosperity turns, are quietly ignored. Mr. White's articles are to be republished as a sixpenny pamphlet.

The Decay of Great Preachers. A contemporary publishes a startling article on the decay of great preachers, in which it is claimed that the race of commanding pulpit heralds is practically dying out. It is said that never since the time of the Reformation was pulpit eminence so rare; never could the Church "count so few stars of the first magnitude in the theological firmament." Higher Criticism and modern thought have had much to do with muzzling men, for they have robbed them of their message. But it must be remembered that such men as Spurgeon, Parker, and Price Hughes are God's special gifts to an age to meet the special need of the Church; and so it will be in the future, for Christ is still Head of His Church. Also the number of good able workers is greater than ever, even though there be fewer of outstanding power, and there is always force when a man has a vocation, and spiritual power to accomplish it.

Preachers and their Sermons. A country vicar confessed lately to the habit of freely preaching other men's sermons, on the ground that a singer is not expected to compose his own songs, nor an actor to write his plays. Unfortunately "the country vicar" ignores the fact that a preacher is identified with his sermon as no singer can be with his song, and no actor with the drama in which he is taking a part. A preacher is not supposed to give forth mere abstract truth, but that which he has tested in his own experience, and passed through the furnace of his own thought and practice. His motto should be: "I have believed, therefore have I spoken." All other preaching, even if it be not insincere, must in the end be barren and unfruitful.

The South African Settlement. We welcome the signs of a better understanding between this country and the Transvaal. The abolition of martial law is a true step forward to a better state of things. Better even than this is the repatriation of the burghers, with its prospects of renewed life on the farms at no distant date. In addition to this, let us hope all the past of bitterness is really past for ever. Much now, humanly speaking, depends upon Mr. Chamberlain. But we must look far beyond him. We, who believe in Him who controls all destinies, shall do well to pray for South Africa at the present time. The real power of settlement is not in Cæsar-like banquets and send-offs, and triumphal marches, but in the adjustment of human affairs to the will of God, and prayer alone will aid this.

"Prayer for Revival."

BY PASTOR W. FULLER GOOCH.

"Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you" (James iv. 8).

ONE of the most cheering signs of the times is the awakened spirit of prayer which is assuredly manifest in many directions. Not only is it seen in the way of organized prayer-circles and missionary as well as other associations formed for special supplication, but also in more retired and unnoticed forms. In many parts of the country, Christians, weary of the lethargy and indifference which have long prevailed, are beginning to realize that the only hope for better things is found in drawing nigh unto God. Many a drawing-room and also humble cottage floor are being "sanctified by the Word of God and prayer."

As in the days of Malachi, there is a movement spreading which can be well described in the prophet's words: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another." It is refreshing in journeying hither and thither to find in many towns, as well as rural districts, how these little knots of praying believers are increasing, and it can but augur well for coming blessing that it should be so. As of old, "the Lord hearkened and heard," so is it, and must it be, still.

Already, as a result, in districts and in circles where such prayer prevails, signs of Divine response are manifest, indicating how truly God is ready to give widespread showers of blessing if only His Church were more alive to the need, and prepared in faith to lay hold of the promised "power from on high."

INFLUENCES HOSTILE TO PRAYER.

In connection with an increased spirit of prayer and multiplication of facilities for its expression, it is well to remember some things essential to power and prevalence in pleading with God. Satan is a determined enemy of prayer, and many are the subtle forms in which he seeks both to hinder its exercise and to frustrate its results. Easily, by the cherishing of a wrong motive, or the yielding to a wrong spirit, may prayer be hindered. In order to prayer prevailing with God, the heart and life of the suppliant must be in accord with His will. We are apt to lose sight of this, and to think that the mere fact of being found in supplication is in itself sufficient.

The prophet of old remonstrated on this very ground with the people of God in his day. He had to say to them, "Ye shall not fast as ye do this day to make your voice to be heard on high." They gathered for prayer, while yet strife and contention, as also oppression of others, were found in their midst. God had to charge them, as His people, with transgression and sin, even while at the same time He could say, "Yet they seek Me daily, and delight to know My ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of Me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God" (Isa. lviii. 2, 4).

PRAYER PERVADING THE LIFE.

The lesson is a solemn and practical one for all time. It is not enough that we pray; we must pray "in the Spirit, and with the understanding also." We must "lift up holy hands, without wrath and doubting." We must live out our prayers. Our business life, our social influence, our every act and deed among our fellow-men, as well as in secret before God, must all be prayer. We pray in action as truly as we do in word. Not only in the grosser forms of sin, from which every truly prayerful heart will shrink with abhorrence, but from its subtler forms, if we are to have power with God, must we withdraw ourselves. Such sins as unforgivingness of spirit in relation to real or fancied charges we may have against our brethren; envy or jealousy of another's gifts or success; secret pride and vainglory; all self-assertion and self-seeking—these are potent factors on Satan's side to hinder power in prayer.

Sins against love, such love as is taught in 1 Cor. xiii., are, we fear, by many not considered sin, as most manifestly God declares He regards them. It is a solemn thing to think of standing before the judgment-seat of Christ in the light of that tremendous chapter; and yet assuredly its principle ranks higher than all others connected with the Christian life: so much so that whatever else we may be characterized by, if this love be absent it profiteth nothing. It is very instructive to see how in all times of past Revival these things have been prominent in the experience of believers.

CONDITIONS OF FORMER REVIVALS.

The writer has lately been re-reading, with no little pleasure and profit, some of the records contained in the publication known to many of us as the forerunner of THE CHRISTIAN, and which, under the name of "The Revival," played so important a part in the glorious scenes and experiences of 1859-60-61. It is very helpful in these days to recall by its means the work of God wrought in the humbling and the cleansing of His people in those days. I quote from one of the earliest numbers the words of a writer who signed himself "A Servant;" he said:—

In a letter from a friend the following question is put: "Should we not diligently seek the more true and deep conversion of saints, and will not the conversion of sinners follow?" This appears to me to be a question of great value. That is, if each individual believer sought the revival of love, of communion with God, of faith and of power, one will most effectually help the other. One warm-hearted believer will attract another; several such coals will make a fire; this, kindling, will spread, and God's presence and power must be felt around.

These late wonderful goings-forth of our God have told this. We have felt the fibres of the heart move as we saw His work; we stooped down to take our sandals off from our feet; we listened rather than spoke; for we found that He was "wonderful in counsel and excellent in working." O Lord, work in all our hearts by Thy mighty power.

This witness is true. There must be the conversion of saints before we see to any great extent the conversion of sinners—conversion of saints, such as will lead to mutual confession of fault, self-humbling and self-mortification, a cleansing of the temple of the body from all which defiles God's rightful abode, and a yielding of the innermost shrine of the heart to His full control. This is essential to power in prayer. Prayer, when it is the result of the energizing of the Spirit, must lead to this. Nothing shows our own deformity or defect, nothing humbles and lays low at the feet of Christ, like real contact with God.

It is thus that true Revival always begins. The Divine presence is realized, the Divine searching is felt, the Divine cleansing and pardon are sought and found, and the Divine inflow of grace and love raises the soul to its right position of conscious peace with God, and the consequent full enjoyment of His promised blessing.

Be it ours, therefore, individually and, as far as we can possibly bring it about, collectively, to betake ourselves in holy earnestness and boldness to the throne of grace, beseeching God that He will be gracious unto us, and once more show how He "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think."

The Outpoured Spirit.—7.

"ALL THINGS ARE YOURS."

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who HATH blessed us with EVERY SPIRITUAL BLESSING in the heavenlies [in heavenly things, in heavenly places] in Christ" (Ephes. i. 3).

THERE was no full, free, present, finished, and eternal salvation until our Lord Jesus Christ had been glorified, and the Holy Spirit had been outpoured. Then God had no more to give. He had given Himself in the Person of His Son, who is the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and the Son had received from the Father the promise of the Spirit. And forth from the Father, through the crucified and glorified Son of His love, was poured upon the infant Church the gift of the Holy Ghost.

"There remaineth no more to be done," either as regards the overthrow of Satan, the glory of Christ, or the blessing of the redeemed; except the execution of the sentence on the adversary, the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, and the manifestation of the sons of God.

As the murderer in the condemned cell under sentence of death is legally dead, so Satan has been judicially sentenced and condemned; because through His death Jesus destroyed or annulled him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and delivered them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.

On the other hand, believers were united to their Saviour in His death, burial, and resurrection, and are regarded as already seated in heavenly places, and as already glorified. All this blessedness is included in the Gospel of God, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

But often the convicted and anxious sinner is not satisfied with this finished work of God in Christ. He wants something more to be done; wants to feel saved, to have dreams or visions, some visible or palpable experience; desires, in a word, a salvation by sight or by works, instead of by grace and faith. Or, again, wants less to have been done, so that he might be saved partly by his own works and partly by the grace of God through faith in Christ Jesus.

But faith is the one lost art, the one essential link between the Creator and the creature. Let that bond be severed, and the creature becomes, like Lucifer the fallen usurper, a wandering star, for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever. "Abraham believed God," and became the father of the faithful and the friend of God.

The work of the soul-winner consists largely in assuring the inquirer that the salvation on God's part is absolutely complete, and all he has to do is to receive Him by whom it has all been fully done.

It is finished, yes, indeed,
Finished every jot;
Sinner, this is all you need,
Tell me, is it not?

At length, driven from every refuge of lies, the "weary, working, plodding one" asks himself the question, "Wherefore toil you so?" and answers it with, "Cease your doing, all was done, long, long ago," and then he finds the promised rest.

But sometimes the soul-winner changes his note, and tells him that the finished work, in its highest result, is not finished after all. He tells the redeemed and forgiven sinner that he is justified, but not yet sanctified; that he has received Christ, but has not yet received the Holy Ghost. The truth is that he is sanctified, and he has received the Holy Ghost.

The primary sense of the verb to sanctify is to separate, to set apart. Our blessed Saviour, in His prayer before He suffered, said to His Father concerning all who believe in Him: "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. . . . For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth." He set Himself apart to die the death of the cross, that they might be truly set apart to God (John xvii.).

In accord with this word of our Lord, the Apostle to the Hebrews (x. 10, xiii. 12) says:—"By which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once," and "wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people through His own blood, suffered without the gate." If we had not thus been sanctified by the act of God, through the blood of Jesus, our inward sanctification would have been impossible. In order to this, no fresh act of God is required. The need is that we listen to the Holy Spirit, as He fulfils the Saviour's promise, "He shall take of Mine and shall show it unto you," and the Father answers the prayer, "Sanctify them in the truth; Thy Word is truth."

Also the convert, the moment he believes, receives the Spirit. This was the assurance of the Apostle Peter, when, at the close of his first utterance of the finished and eternal Gospel on the day of Pentecost, the people asked, "Men-brethren, what shall we do?" The answer was, "Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, unto the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Paul preached the same truth to the twelve disciples at Ephesus, as Peter at Jerusalem, at Samaria, and at Cesarea; and in each case they received the gift of the Holy Ghost at the outset of their Christian life. So also the Galatians "began in the Spirit," having "received the Spirit by the hearing of faith," when before their eyes Jesus Christ had been openly set forth crucified (Gal. iii.).

We conclude, then, that every believer has received the Holy Spirit; for "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His." "No man can say that Jesus is Lord but in the Holy Ghost." But it is one thing to have received the Spirit and another to be filled with the Spirit—of which a few words in our next. M.

Cowper and the Pope.

(Cancelled from "The Expostulation" for fear of wounding the feelings of the poet's Roman Catholic friends, the Throckmortons.)

Hast thou admitted, with a blind, fond trust,
The lie that burned my fathers' bones to dust,
That first adjudged them heretics, then sent
Their souls to heaven, and cursed them as they went?
The lie that Scripture strips of its disguise,
And execrates above all other lies;
The lie that claps a lock on mercy's plan,
And gives the key to yon infirm old man,
Who once ensconced in apostolic chair
Is deified, and sits omniscient there;
The lie that knows no kindred, owns no friend,
But him that makes its progress his chief end,
That having spilt much blood, makes that a boast,
And canonizes him that sheds the most?
Away with charity that soothes a lie,
And thrusts the truth with scorn and anger by!
Shame on the candour and the gracious smile
Bestowed on them that light the martyr's pile,
While insolent disdain in frowns expressed
Attends the tenets that endured the test!
Grant them the rights of men, and, while they cease
To vex the peace of others, grant them peace;
But trusting bigots whose false zeal has made
Treachery their duty, thou art self-betrayed.

An Offer to our Readers.

JUST two years ago our publishers enlisted the interest of many readers of The Christian in a scheme which, while designed to promote the circulation of the paper, was instrumental in placing copies of the well-known Two-Version Bible in the hands of many devoted workers. Thus a very valuable Bible became the companion in labour of preachers, teachers, and evangelists who, in order to secure it, quite willingly brought The Christian under the notice of new readers.

With the same object in view, Messrs. Morgan and Scott are prepared to present, on conditions now to be explained, a copy of a work of great practical utility, entitled The Topical Bible: A Digest of the Holy Scriptures—in which the facts and teachings of the inspired record are grouped under over 20,000 topics and sub-topics, with 100,000 references to the parts and portions of the Word.

what is "the topical bible"?

The product of many years of labour, in which knowledge and judgment conspired to a noble result, The Topical Bible brings together in cyclopædic form, and under familiar headings, all that the Bible contains on a multitude of subjects. The method pursued has been, first, to analyse topically each verse of the Bible, each series of verses, and each chapter and series of chapters; and, second, to group under suitable headings in alphabetical order all the scriptures related to the subjects found in the analysis. And, mind, we have not merely the references, but the passages in their entirety, the whole of which are printed in bold type, which it is a pleasure to read.

There is an elaborate system of cross references to kindred and antithetical subjects. An index extending over 150 pages indicates the pages and columns in which each verse of the Bible is quoted—however frequently, and for whatever purpose. Names of persons and places are given, as well as topics, throughout the work.

Other features include an analysis and classification of the Psalms according to their ruling subject; a list of the Old Testament passages quoted in the New; and a presentation, under the head of Select Readings, of those portions and incidents of Holy Writ which are, in the judgment of all men, regarded as literary gems. The book consists of over 1,600 large pages.

an ideal book for christian workers.

That this is an ideal book for Christian workers, will appear from the following illustrative particulars:—We take the word Prayer. After a miscellany of minor sub-topics, affording suggestion at a glance for many a Bible talk, we have a list of unclassified Scriptures relating to the subject. Then come (1) Cases in which Answer is Promised; (2) Passages in which Answer is Acknowledged; and (3) Instances of Answered Prayer. Next we have Scriptures on Confession in Prayer, then Importunity, and afterwards Cases of Importunity. The remaining sections relate to Intercessory Prayer; the Prayer of the Wicked (not heard); Pleas Offered in Prayer; and Prayer and Thanksgiving before Taking Food. In all, here are over fourteen pages of two columns each, presenting in full, for reading or study, the teaching of God's Word with reference to Prayer. Some subjects are treated at greater length, e.g., to "Church," twenty-seven pages are devoted; to "Commandments," fifteen; to "Death," thirteen; to "Faith," sixteen; to "God," eighty-eight; to "Jesus, the Christ," ninety. You ask what Scripture says on a great point of teaching. Open this book, and the passages on the subject are before you for immediate perusal and connected study.

THE recent international congress, held at Bonn, of the Old Catholic Church, was considered to be more successful than any of its predecessors. The dogma of Papal Infallibility was declared to be an effectual barrier in the way of internal reform of the Romish Church. In a most cheering account of the progress of the Los von Rom, it was reported that during the past three years 7,000 Austrian Romanists had become Old Catholics in addition to those who became Protestants. The American Polish Bishop, Koslowski, from Chicago, announced that he numbered in his diocese 100,000 seceders from Rome, and that the movement was still going forward.

Probably no country has ever been so completely in the power of the monks as the Philippines. The American Government does not interfere with religion. It is, indeed, prohibited from doing so by its Constitution. But President Roosevelt determined that this curse should be removed, and the Pope has had to consent to their withdrawal. That the inhabitants are of the same mind as the President, has been proved by recent events on the islands. A great struggle against the Orders has begun in the district. On the 20th July, a political meeting was held at Manila, at the close of which the audience, excited by the speeches they had heard, went en masse to the walled quarter of the city, where most of the churches are to be found, and there made a great demonstration, crying "Away with the monks!" The police had to take precautions for the preservation of public order. The determination of the United States to free the people from the burden of the monks has evidently the approval of their new subjects.

Many of the expelled French Orders emigrated to Switzerland. This Federation of Republics is usually tolerant in the highest degree, but after some time woke up to the danger that it was incurring, and determined to put in force its laws against the establishment of new Religious Orders. The Federal Government gave eleven Orders three months' notice that they must leave the country.

The Twopenny Tube has been made the subject of an excellent Gospel address by Mr. Russell R. Smith, evangelist, in which the way of salvation is set forth in a most concise and attractive way. In booklet form, bearing the above title (1d. Partridge & Co.), it should prove very useful for wide distribution.

Medland Hall.—The excellent work among friendless and homeless men done at Medland Hall is well described by Mr. F. M. Holmes, in an illustrated booklet just issued. If friends will send to Mr. E. W. Gates (Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.) for copies, the story will plead in powerful fashion the cause of those who are cold and hungry. In one year, 144,860 applications were made at Medland Hall for sleeping room, 173,130 free meals were given, and 11,429 men were helped in various ways. The cost of housing and feeding the men comes to only 1½d. each per night.

SUNDAY, December 7. 2 Kings iii.

IT is extraordinary to find Jehoshaphat again in close alliance with the house of Israel. He had no right to repeat that sentence which had already nearly cost him his life (v. 7). We must come out and be separate, and not touch the unclean thing, if God is to receive us.

Notice, when the three kings came to Elisha, he repeated the formula that once was so often on Elijah's lips (v. 14). Whence had he learnt it save from his master! Ah, it is good to coin phrases like this, which those that follow us may adopt and use long after we have gone.

The soothing power of music stealing over Elisha's soul calmed and quieted it, so that his untroubled nature, like the blue waters of some quiet lake, might take and keep the calm of heaven. We need to have the discords of our soul arrested, and our mind brought into the place of God, before we can hear Him speak. Oh that the new song may be wafted to us, and that mind, and heart, and will, may be brought into accord with the eternal music.

Note those words! "Ye shall not see wind, nor shall ye see rain, yet that valley shall be filled with water." How often we are waiting to see the accompaniments and signs of God's presence and blessing—instead of daring to believe that He is doing as He has said, though we see not outward signs. Often when there is no rhetoric in our speech, and no sensible evidence of power, the valley is filled with water. Not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of God is His will wrought in the world. Be at rest, God is at work; all that thou needest to do is to fill the valley with ditches. Make room, and make way for God! God will come, and not keep silence!

MONDAY, December 8. 2 Kings iv.

Do the people with whom we mingle day by day perceive that we are holy men of God (9)? Notice what frequent stress is laid on this fact (vv. 7, 9, 21, 22, 25, 27, 40). It was as though the prophet's own name were forgotten in this noble designation. The glory of God so absolutely overshadowed him, that when men and women met him they were compelled to think of God only.

But if we are men of God, we shall be accessible to all human need and sorrow. Widows will come to us about their creditors and their boys; mothers will come to us with inexpressible anguish about their dying children; our fellow-servants will come to us about the poison that threatens them; and all hungry souls will look to be fed by our instrumentality. Notice how these miracles anticipate the miracles of our Lord. As Elijah's ministry was a presage of John the Baptist's, so Elisha's was of our Lord's; and we are reminded that He said of those who believe, that they should do similar works to His own, and greater (John xiv. 12).

Let us remember this, and whenever an appeal comes to us for help let us be sure that somehow we can meet it. Within our reach there are agencies waiting to be set on foot, and the Lord Himself, who has gone to the Father for this very purpose, is prepared to repeat through us the mighty deeds which He began during His earthly ministry (Acts i. 1).

Perhaps the abortive use of the staff was to free the people of the time of the superstitious notion of mechanical and sacramental efficacy, and to lead them to see that mighty works could only be wrought through living sympathy, prayer, and faith. The stretching of the prophet on the cold body of the child, irrespective of ceremonial pollution, and his earnest prayers to the Lord are a beautiful illustration of the combination of reliance on the power of God and the touch of quick human sympathy, neither of which can be dispensed with by those who would raise those dead in trespasses and sins.

TUESDAY, December 9. 2 Kings v.

Naaman strikes one as an elect soul—one of the many which in every nation have feared God and wrought righteousness. Disappointment, sickness, and the inner teaching of God's Spirit had brought him to such a condition that he was willing to listen, first, to a little maid; second, to the suggestion that there might be healing through a Hebrew Prophet; and, thirdly, to the remonstance of his servants (13).

It is true that at one point he was almost about to turn away because the blessing did not come just as he expected, and because the Word of God was quick, and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword. But, as a set-off to this, which was not unnatural, remember that he did ultimately yield, and in earnest faith dipped seven times in the Jordan waters. Remember also his liberality, which brought £4,000 to £5,000; his desire to worship Jehovah; his fear lest his official connection with idolatry might be held to compromise him; and his ready beneficence towards Gehazi, whom he supposed to have come in Elisha's name. All these are symptoms of a noble soul, on whom the Divine Spirit had been at work; and we are reminded of Cornelius, his counterpart in the new Testament. What a comfort it is to believe that God has ever been at work on such souls as these, fashioning them with His own hands, till the moment arrived for an Elisha or a Peter to put the finishing touch.

The seven-fold plunge in the current led to Naaman's diseased flesh coming sweet and pure to him, as that of a little child. What a beautiful combination—the strength of age and the sweetness of childhood! Let us, too, make for the River of God, which flows from the Throne, that we may be forgiven and cleansed, that we may return to the days of our youth, becoming not childish but childlike.

WEDNESDAY, December 10. 2 Kings vi.

These incidents and miracles have their meanings for us also. We are constantly meeting with those who have lost heart and hope, and have sunk like this iron axe-head to the bottom of the river. There they lie beneath the rushing waters of despondency. Ah, but there is the cross of our Lord Jesus, where he died for us, bearing our sin and guilt in His own body on the tree, which, when applied to heart and conscience by the Holy Spirit, can make the iron swim. "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord; my spirit shall be joyful in my God."

But one of the most helpful of all the incidents in Elisha's life is that story of the horses and chariots of fire. Please notice that they were there, though the young man who had taken Gehazi's place, and was not initiated into the mysteries of the spiritual life, did not see them. All that was needed was that his eyes should be opened. The one need for all of us is that we should know the things which are freely given us of God. The Lord still sits, as on the well at Sychar, saying to the crowds of men, who come hither to draw, "If only you knew, if only you knew." That which came to the young man, at the prophet's request, might come to us all, and always. The great hindrance is the heavy veil woven of self-indulgence and transgression. Oh that it was torn in sunder from the top to the bottom!

Verse 19 is ambiguous in the A.V., but not in the R.V., where the change of "But" to "And" makes the meaning plain—"And he led them to Samaria."

The gentle spirit of Elisha is manifested in the advice of verse 22, which had excellent effect. How beautiful to see such an illustration of the spirit of the Gospel; but such men are nevertheless hated, and credited with the disasters which are the result of the sins against which they protest (v. 31).

THURSDAY, December 11. 2 Kings vii.

There is a sore famine just now over the whole world—a famine of the Word of God. For some years it has been growing in severity, and now the Church of God is beginning to bestir herself. But within her limits there are two classes of men—those who, like Elisha, with prophetic soul, descry the approach of the time of plenty, and those who, like the unbelieving courtier, think that it is impossible. Thank God, the unbelief of the latter shall not neutralise the joyous faith which "laughs at impossibilities, and cries, It shall be done!"

But the blessing may be discovered to the Church by those who are excluded from the camp. When God sends blessing to His people, He rarely takes the methods that we might expect, but chooses the foolish and weak things, yea, the things that are not, to bring to nought the things that are, that none may glory in His presence. To humble and lowly souls that read these words, we say: "When in the first glint of the morning light you discover the plenteousness of the Divine answer to your prayers, do not keep the good news to yourselves lest punishment overtake you, but be sure to bring us instant word." Yet, even in the midst of plenty, there will be those who shall perish by their unbelief. Only those who receive the abundance of grace and of the free gift shall reign in life (Rom. v. 17).

FRIDAY, December 12. 2 Kings viii.

To the casual observer it might have seemed that this conversation between the King and Gehazi, at the very time when this woman made her appeal, was a coincidence. But we dare not think so. All life is under law to God. He is in everything that happens to us. There is hardly one of us that cannot tell of providences just as singular and opportune as this. It seems specially beautiful that God had taken up the case of one of his servants' friends, as though He, too, had become responsible for her well-being, and wanted to reward her for the kindness which she had bestowed on His faithful servant.

As our Lord wept over the fate of Jerusalem, so the prophet wept as he foresaw the evils which Hazael would inflict on his people. But how little we know ourselves. Hazael could not stand the stedfast eye of the prophet, and asked in amazement what he took him to be, that he could prognosticate such a future. We may well appropriate the Apostle's words, "Lord, is it I?" for there is no limit to the lengths of sin to which we may be led, apart from the grace of God.

The fuller story of Jehoram's reign, and the apparent extinction of the royal family, is given in 2 Chron. xxi. 2-20, and xxii.; but notice this 19th verse. Let godly parents be of good courage; God will see to it that a lamp is left to them, and a lamp (as in the Chicago fire) may lead to a great conflagration (see Isa. lix. 21).

SATURDAY, December 13. 2 Kings ix.

This commission, given by Elisha, was in pursuance of the Divine command to Elijah (1 Kings xix. 16). But the time for executing the solemn behest had not arrived till at this moment, when the generals and army were at Ramoth-Gilead, whilst the two kings, representatives of Ahab, were together at Jezreel. It is said that the ancient tower of Jezreel must have commanded a view of the valley some five or six miles towards the Jordan, and all the incidents of this chapter may be verified so far as topographical details are concerned. These are points which make it difficult to accept the findings of the higher critics.

How constantly the human heart reiterates the cry, Is it peace? Is it peace? (17, 18, 19, 22). But what peace can there be to the individual or nation so long as impurity is openly permitted (v. 22)? It may be that thou hast not had the peace of God brooding as a dove in thy heart for many a long day; but the answer may also be found within thy heart. The grieved Holy Spirit is there, but as a mighty man that cannot save; and matters can never be right until thou hast repented and cleansed thyself of all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

Within, within, oh turn
Thy spirit's eyes, and learn
Thy wandering senses gently to control,
Thy dearest Friend dwells deep within thy soul,
And asks thyself of thee,
That heart, and mind, and sense, He may make whole
In perfect harmony.

A Fortnight in Burma.—II.

At present there are about 40,000 professing (Protestant) Christians in Burma, most of whom are Karens. About 3,000 are Burmese, 500 to 600 Telugu and Tamils, and also a sprinkling of Shans, Shins, and Talaings. The work is almost entirely done by the American Baptists, who not only teach loyalty to Christ, but also loyalty to the British Government. The sentiment thus created finds illustration in a quaint remark made by a student when a few years ago the desirability of an Anglo-American Union was discussed at the A.B.M. Theological Seminary, Isein. "Great Britain is our father," said the speaker, "America is our mother; and naturally they ought to be wedded."

During our visit to Burma we stayed with Rev. W. F. and Mrs. Armstrong. They and their family of two sons and a daughter devote themselves to mission and school work among the Telugus and Tamils at Rangoon and Moulmein. Besides these two vernaculars, English and Hindustani are taught at schools, which shows the complicated character of the work.

Miss Armstrong is very strong upon gathering in the little ones as soon as possible. "Give us the child before the age of six, and we do not care who has it afterwards," is the Roman Catholic motto, and it is emphatically hers. The tiny mites from three years upwards reflect their teacher's enthusiasm in their beaming little faces when going through their exercises. Without any attempt at reading, they know more of the Bible than many an English child at this stage of life. All educationalists agree as to the IMPORTANCE OF KINDER-GARTEN TEACHING.

Why is it not more extensively adopted by missionaries? We should be very glad of an answer to this question.

Moulmein is beautifully situated at the confluence of three rivers, blessed with the most luxuriant vegetation, and with a lovely view upon the not far distant hill ranges. The yearly rainfall here is 200 inches. The town can be reached by boat from Rangoon in about eleven hours. Here Judson laboured for many years. Here in the old compound we met Dr. and Mrs. Stevens, now in charge of the work. In 1898 Dr. Stevens had to pass through a painful operation of the larynx performed by William Williams Keen, M.D., LL.D., of Philadelphia Jefferson Medical College. The symptoms being the same as in the case of Emperor Frederick, it seems as if the result achieved were a triumph of surgery. Deprived of his vocal chords, Dr. Stevens devotes himself mostly to literary work. There is a splendid school for Burmese girls, under the principalship of Miss Whitehead, and also an Anglo-Indian school for European and Eurasian girls.

To let us have a glimpse of jungle-life our friends arranged an excursion by native boat forty miles down the River Salween. Mattresses and pillows were spread on the hooded boat. At nightfall eight of us climbed in one by one with baskets and boxes of eatables and drinkables; for we were to visit a lady not prepared for such a large company. At midnight the rowers halted in a creek to wait for the tide. They spent their time in passing a water-pipe from one to another. We were facing the south, and its two constellations, the false and the true cross, rose almost perpendicularly above the horizon. The true cross is smaller, less brilliant and less symmetrical than the false one; but it points to the South Pole, as the Cross of Jesus points to the resurrection. After a few hours we moved on. Attempts at sleep having been cut short by a salt-wave sweeping over our faces, we continued gazing at the sky until the stars parted and vanished with the dawn. We went ashore inquiring for Miss Haswell. The dark little boy shook his head. He did not know where the lady lived. "Do you know Mem Sahib Padre?" asked our companion. "Certainly; Mem Padre was just round the corner."

Miss Haswell, who is the Padre, an English Christian brother, Mr. Iliffe and the pilot, are the only English-speaking people in the place. Miss Haswell was born in the country, and speaks Burmese like her own language. Her parents were contemporaries with Dr. Judson, having come to Burma in 1835. She laboured a long time at Moulmein, but for the last eighteen years her activities have been confined to Amherst, in connection with the A.B.M.

Among the few Christians who form the following, we shook hands with a poor old womau who has been holding on for the last twenty years. She had been when one day she applied for baptism. On hearing this her husband took an ox and beat it until it bled; then turning to his wife he said: "What I have done to this beast, I will do if you dare to become a Christian. She wavered not, but openly confessed her faith through baptism. A few days after, her husband asked her to accompany him for some purpose into the jungle. She obeyed. After they had gone far enough not to be heard, he turned round upon her and did according to his threat. He might have beaten her to death had not her son, feeling uneasy about his mother, followed them and rescued the poor, fainting creature from his father's wrath. Notwithstanding all the ill-treatment to which henceforth she became subject, she has remained faithful, and to this day clings to the hope of seeing her husband converted some day. Quality is better than quantity.

Miss Haswell's special work is itinerating. In the evening three bullock-carts full of people drove to a little village, three miles out of Amherst. In the heart of a cluster of cottages hidden in palm and jak fruit trees we made halt, had our oxen detached, and candles lighted. The carts formed our platform. Old and young flocked around us before a hymn was started, forming such as we seldom gaze at. For an hour and a half Mr. Armstrong and my husband preached to them through the interpretation of Miss Haswell, enjoining them to leave their false gods, and to cleave to the only true God as revealed by Jesus our Lord. The Spirit evidently works in those benighted hearts; for after the meeting, while taking away tracts, many men with serious countenances came close to the interpreter with questions and objections, seemingly unwilling to break off the conversation.

The moon peeping through the trees reminded us of the late hour and of the necessity of moving on. Armed with empty biscuit-tins to drum away tigers which were said to haunt the neighbourhood, we emerged from the thicket of the village, keeping closely together, and some of the company singing as loudly as their lungs would permit, we reached the mission-home, our hearts beating wild with excitement.

In some parts of Burma, wild animals are much on the increase. Natives are not allowed to carry firearms. If they had they would perhaps not make a legitimate use of them. Just before we came to Amherst, the natives had a devil's dance, imploring the demons to free them from tigers, but the answer was, "You are too wicked a people: you shall have more tigers."

A little time ago Miss Haswell severed her connection with the A.B.M., and works now independently of, though in harmony with the Society. Her object in view is the establishment of industrial work in order to reach three classes of people, the blind, the fishermen, and the gravediggers, called "Governors of the Dead." Buddhist teaching being that misfortunes that happen to us in our present life are the effects of misdeeds committed in a former life, no pity is expended upon the afflicted ones. If a man is deaf or dumb or blind, it is his own fault, and he must bear his deserved punishment.

On the other hand, though there is avowedly no caste in Buddhism, there are certain classes of people utterly despised by others. None would mingle with gravediggers. They are communities by themselves, living in or near grave-yards. Silkworm growers, hunters, and fishermen are despised on account of taking life. The last profession is the least objectionable, because the fisherman does not really kill the fish, but only takes them out of water. In order not to take life the Buddhist will commit all kinds of abominable cruelties, expose old animals to slow starvation, fling a useless cat out into the street to find its death under a wheel, cart, &c., all for the sake of keeping the letter of Buddha's teaching. He enjoined kindness to animals, not from the point of human duty but because it brought merit to the soul. Duty, love, pity, compassion, are motives essentially Christian, and Christian only.

Christian Blind in India.

FOR sixteen years work of a distinctly missionary character has been carried on for the blind at St. Catherine's Hospital (C.E.Z.M.S.), Amritsar, in the Punjab, by Miss Annie Sharp. The accession of numbers, chiefly by reason of the late famines in India, has led to the conclusion that a Home in the country would be better for the inmates than their continuing to live in Amritsar city, which has a population of 162,000.

Gifts from generous friends enabled Miss Sharp to buy a property, with several buildings, at Rajpur, Mussoorie, and it is hoped that next April the whole school may be moved there. But this will not be possible until some "barracks" and workshops are built for the blind boys. The institution receives women, girls, and boys, who are trained according to their several capacities, and a number of useful workers have gone to other places.

Three are Bible-women in connection with St. Catherine's Hospital, and it is likely others will shortly be sent elsewhere as teachers of the blind. One young woman is already filling such a post in Allahabad.

This being the first school for the blind opened in India, and perhaps, at present, the only Home, it is hoped it may be very serviceable in supplying teachers for future schools. In its new home it will depend upon no Society for support, but will rely entirely upon what the Lord's people contribute. A profit amounting to £10 or £15 a year is made on the industrial work carried on at the Home.

In connection with the school there is a good library, containing about eighty volumes of books in the Moon type, and over 300 volumes in the Shirreff-Braille type, which are all books of the Bible. Besides these there are in the same type 300 primers and readers, as well as the entire Bible, and 100 useful and interesting books in English Braille.

Gospel Books for Italy.

FOUNDED in 1855 by the Synod of the Waldensian Church, the Italian Evangelical Publication Society has for nearly half a century been the only agency in the Peninsula for the supply of Gospel books to the Evangelical churches. In 1862 it was transferred from Turin to Florence, with its own press, the Claudian. It has all along enjoyed the confidence of the churches, and has been helped by annual grants from the Religious Tract Society, of London, and the Italian Evangelization Society (Waldensian Aid Committee), of Edinburgh.

Of late the work of the Society has been much hindered through lack of funds, and the grants from London and Edinburgh have had to be considerably curtailed. In these circumstances, the Committee has felt obliged to send their secretary, Pastor Odoardo Jalla, to stir up interest in the work in England. In various quarters Pastor Jalla has presented his appeal, and secured welcome help. He returns to Italy in a few days. Letters may be addressed to him, to the care of the Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

English-speaking Girls in Paris.

THE Mission Home for British and American Girls in Paris, 77, Avenue Wagram, completes its thirtieth year December 20. Over 12,230 of our young countrywomen have been resident, welcomed, cared for, dealt with personally, brought within the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord, of whom about 7,323 left for situations chosen with a care freely given; whilst thousands of outsiders came to our free registry, which is associated with 120 chaplaincies and consulates throughout Europe, for advice, or impelled by a feeling of loneliness in a foreign land.

Volumes might be written of dangers averted, "songs in the night" after days of darkness which might be felt, times of deepest anxiety penetrated by the wondrous dealing of our Almighty Father's loving care. What the summing up will be in the great day of account, of young lives blessed, touched, as one expressed it, "with the reality of Jesus Christ," He alone knows.

Not the least of God's gifts has been the self-denying lady-workers—leaving homes of comfort, giving their youth, and toiling, at their own charges, from twenty-six to twenty-nine years. One of our needs to-day is to fill their places.

There is no endowment—even for repairs to the property, which always came at an uncertain time—and the friends whose generous gifts purchased 77, Avenue Wagram (which is held in perpetuity by a special licence of the Board of Trade, so that it can never be diverted to any other purpose than that for which it was acquired), have passed to their rest and their reward.

As I write—after by God's help succeeding in having the "Taxe pour la Culte de Religion," which amounted to over £1,600, remitted—there are mountains of difficulty to face, needing strong faith in a city where—as a poor struggling girl expressed it—"nothing pays like sin!" and the question of "how to live" becomes daily more acute.

Over £800 is wanted—as our generous and patient treasurer, Mr. F. A. Bevan, knows too well—if our thirtieth year is to be closed without indebtedness.

"Come Over and Help Us."

AS I read the interesting account of the missionary meeting at Keswick, I could not help wishing that one of those dear sisters who stood up to show their desire to go to the foreign mission field, could come at her own charges and help us in the work among the heathen women and girls of Benares.

If this should meet the eye of any lady who does not feel able to join a society, but who would like to come here and work among the heathen, I shall be glad to share my home and work with her, and she may be sure of a warm welcome. If she will write to me, I will give her any information she needs with regard to the climate and the work, &c.

There is a wide field of labour in this district where I live, and also in the surrounding villages. The people are all poor, and many of the women are very ignorant; but they listen with interest to the Gospel message we bring them. I have lately commenced a Bible-class for women of low caste. It is held in a small church kindly lent to us by the C.M.S. There are fifty-nine women who attend regularly, and there are hopeful cases among them, though the conditions of life are such as to make it very difficult for them to confess Christ by baptism. Many of them can repeat texts of Scripture, and sing translated Gospel hymns very nicely. It is a joy to be "telling of His salvation from day to day," and we long that others should share this joy. The life of a missionary is a truly happy one.

Famine in Finland.

OWING to the very wet and cold summer, and to the sudden and early frost, the harvest has failed almost entirely in the three northern Governments of Finland. In Pnomussalmi the potatoes are to a great extent destroyed. Those that have been gathered are little larger than berries. The rain has prevented both the oats and the rye from producing sufficient for seed. The blight and the frost have made even this almost useless. Many have sought to make bread from the rye. It is scarcely possible to believe that it is bread. It is quite green, and hardly holds together, and is so bitter that one cannot well swallow a morsel of it. Yet it is all that many have to live on. And even this will not last many weeks. There are places where the people have not even this bread, but have to live on such as they can make from the bark of trees. With milk one might eat bark bread, but many have not this. They must kill their only cow. The hay harvest has failed.

Destructive frosts are no unfrequent visitors in these parts. The poor people know well what it is to suffer need. It has, however, not often happened that, as now, the failure of the hay harvest and the potato crop has been followed by an almost entire failure of the oats and rye.

Those who have the opportunity of travelling in these parts, of visiting one of the little homes, of seeing the sad faces of the mothers and the white faces of the almost naked children, of hearing their cries for bread, and of seeing how many cry in vain, realise how great and how pressing is the need.

Rev. J. D. Kilburn, writing from Sordavala, gives some account of remedial efforts that are being put forth, and states

SOME CASES ILLUSTRATING THE NEED.

Mr. Kilburn says: "Wherever possible, work is being found for those who are able to do it, such as cutting wood, making roads, draining marshes, &c. There are many, living in lonely and distant parts, who cannot leave their homes to go to this work. For instance, K. H. and his wife have for many years cultivated a small farm. His wife has died and left him with five young children, for whom he has to do everything. Even in good years it was very difficult to obtain enough of the plainest food to sustain life, but last year he only obtained ten hectolitres of potatoes, with three of rye, and no corn. Pastor Wayrynen, who knows him well, speaks of him as a true and earnest Christian, and says, too, that the man and his children will starve unless they are helped. A. W. is a farm-labourer. He is sick and infirm, but, with the help of his wife, has been able to earn sufficient to live on. Now his wife is dead and he is left alone with six children. The eldest of these is only fourteen years old. Weak and ailing though he is, he would gladly work if he could, but those who have hitherto employed him have not reaped enough to live on, so are unable to keep him longer.

"Then there are many widows left with three and four or even more children, who are utterly unable to find work of any kind. They and their children must die if they are not speedily helped.

"The state of the children is in many cases particularly sad. Many have nothing more than a single shirt, and can only go outside the door when some older brother or sister puts off some scanty clothing to lend to them. Others may be seen day by day walking long distances, amid the cold and frost, with utterly insufficient clothing, to school. Most of them have had hardly anything to eat before leaving home and will get little or nothing after returning.

"An effort is being made by the friends in some parishes to raise means to enable the teachers to give these children a piece of black bread daily, so as to still the cravings of hunger and enable them to continue to attend school."

Communications may be addressed to Mr. Kilburn at Lekta Boxstrom, Sordavala, Finland, or to Pastor Wayrynen, Kajana, Finland.

Religious Life in Canada.

THE annual gatherings of the different denominations have shown unusual zeal in mission work both at home and abroad. Strong effort is being centred in Western Canada by reason of the large influx from other lands, and the rapid development of that great country. The Presbyterians and Methodists have appointed special officials for the oversight of this work, while the other denominations have also largely increased their gifts for a more aggressive campaign. At present each Church feels its inability to respond adequately to the urgent calls from the quickly growing centres of the West.

The subjectof Church Union was a prominent one at most of the gatherings. The quadrennial conference of the Methodist Church made a deliverance against the overlapping now so prevalent, and committees of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches are in session at the moment of writing to see what can be done in this matter. The Methodist Conference is forwarding a resolution to the officials of the other churches on the wider question of union. The president of the Baptist Convention also spoke on the importance of union between churches near together, while the Congregationalists and Presbyterians by their fraternal delegates urged a mutual approach in the matter of independence and doctrinal creed.

A number of public questions were earnestly discussed, including the Prohibition referendum now before the electors of the Province of Ontario, and Sunday Observance. The annual meetings, almost without exception, urged a "yea" vote for Prohibition on December 4, and a strong effort to stay the growing laxity in the observance of Sunday. Protests were made by several of the denominations against precedence in the matter of State functions, while the Education Bill, which is so strongly opposed by Nonconformists in England, was condemned by their representatives in Canada.

Apart from the annual meetings of the denominations, and since their adjournment, a good deal of activity has been manifested in church circles. Some years ago, our British brethren, Revs. Charles Inwood, G. H. C. Macgregor, and Hubert Brooke, visited Canada and held a series of meetings in different places for the purpose of deepening spiritual life. Since then, annual conventions for a like purpose have been held with more or less gratifying results. One has just been held in Montreal, largely under the direction of Rev. Dr. Wilson, of New York, in which all churches joined. At the closing meeting an impressive communion service was held, which was conducted by ministers of the different denominations, including a rector of the Church of England.

Every year the Canadian churches are favoured with visits by brethren from the Old Land, and this year seems to have brought a larger number than usual. A delegation from the Union of England and Wales—Revs. Alfred Rowland, LL.B., and J. D. Jones, B.D., Mr. Edward Smith and Dr. Fred S. Lambert—visited the Congregational churches. Their addresses were greatly appreciated, and much good is expected from their sojourn in Canada. The Baptists have been favoured with a visit from Rev. Wilkins Jenkins, D.D., of Huddersfield, and the Methodists with one from Rev. George Jackson, of Edinburgh. Such visits from Britain are always an inspiration to church life in Canada, and many more of them would be warmly welcomed.

The Opium Traffic.—The November issue of National Righteousness contains the text of the Act passed by the New Zealand Parliament to prohibit the importation or smoking of opium. Mr. David McLaren has contributed an incisive and enlightening criticism of Lord George Hamilton's defence of the Opium Trade in a recent correspondence with the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade. Those who find the records of movements like this to be mournful reading will have their minds uplifted by the letter which Mrs. Josephine Butler has written to the editor.

Mr. Richard Turner,

SECRETARY OF THE PURE LITERATURE SOCIETY.

FORTY-EIGHT years' continuous service in the same position is at once an indication of fitness for the post, and a proof of ripe experience and wide knowledge of the matters in Mr. Turner's charge.

The need is not less pressing now for the earnest and discreet advocacy of pure literature than it was half a century ago, when Mr. John Macgregor, better known as "Rob Roy," threw himself into the establishment of a society which should make its special business the circulation of good reading in periodical and book form. The beginning was tentative, but the seed has grown into a goodly tree. Every year now shows a record of useful work maintained from offices in that quiet little cul-de-sac, Buckingham Street, which lies near Charing Cross Station, between the Strand and the Thames Embankment.

Shortly after its formation Mr. Richard Turner, then quite young, was appointed secretary by the Committee, and now, having reached the proverbial span of life, he strikes you as being well under sixty, and fitted for many more years of service. This is partly due to his abstemious habits. Through nearly all his working career he has been a total abstainer—believing in the moderate advocacy of principles of moderation—and a non-smoker. He is almost a vegetarian, making a lunch of milk and cake. It is also due to his love of travel; he may incline nowadays more to his office desk than is wise; but still every year he pursues his lifelong practice of spending his vacation on the Continent. He has also been to Morocco, and four times in Algiers, while most European countries may be considered as familiar ground—Spain, Switzerland, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, and, of course, France having revealed to him their beauties and curiosities.

Travel has been comparatively easy because of his facility in French, which has become to him a second mother tongue. Mr. Turner was born in Jersey, but was forbidden by his parents to speak the French patois common to Channel Islanders. At ten years of age he was sent to a college in the French town of Coutance, and there acquired the true French accent. He has only occasional use for it in the Pure Literature office, but it was a valuable help at the recent International Pure Literature Conference at Basle. He tells an amusing story of visiting a conference at Brussels on the same subject, at which he spoke for half an hour in French. At the close, some delegate inquired, "But where is the English delegate whom we were expecting?"

The Pure Literature Society works in a distinctly limited groove. Its business is not to publish, but to select the books issued by other publishers fit to place in readers' hands, and to extend their circulation. It thus becomes increasingly useful as the years pass and knowledge and recommendations accumulate. In January of this year was printed a catalogue of nearly five thousand selected books, ranging from sixpence to half a guinea, copies of most of which may be seen at Buckingham Street. The list is eclectic, and while containing many stories and standard religious works, opens out into fields of science, travel, and literature. The catalogue gives name of book, author, and publisher, and, in eight columns, notes by a star whether suitable for soldiers, sailors, emigrants, servants, young women, schools, village libraries, or working men's libraries.

Every book has been read by at least two ladies or members of the committee, who note on a printed slip the pages on which they find, if any, objectionable passages. It often happens that well-meaning authors put into the mouths of characters expressions of a doubtful nature, which some young people might by consequence think themselves justified to use with freedom. If a difference of opinion exists between the two readers, the book is handed to a third, and the committee finally decide.

For many years Mr. Turner spent several autumn weeks in calling upon newsagents to encourage the sale of better-class periodicals, and in so doing has visited 28,000 newsvendors in nearly 300 towns. The same method is still pursued by other members of the staff.

One of the special aims of the Pure Literature Society has been to encourage the formation in parishes and villages of magazine associations whose members act as amateur colporteurs. Some hundreds of these now exist, many receiving monthly parcels direct from Buckingham Street, others negotiating purchase through local newsagents.

Another valuable effort has been the issue of libraries at half the published price, and sometimes as free gifts. The scheme originated in an offer of the late Mr. Baxter, a member of the committee, to make good the loss. Workmen's societies, Y.M.C.A's, missions, ragged schools, and similar bodies remit any sum, choose their books from the catalogue, and receive twice the value. More than 9,000 such issues have been made, the book values amounting to nearly £80,000. Free grants of books to ship libraries and to lighthouse crews have proved an inestimable boon.

No members of the original committee remain. Lord Kinnaird succeeded Lord Shaftesbury as president, and among the vice-presidents of to-day, are the two archbishops and Lords Roberts and Wolseley. The committee is a comprehensive body, including several earls and bishops, and such practical men as Mr. Quintin Hogg, Dr. Oswald Dykes, Mr. Sydney Buxton, M.P., and Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P.

There is not a county in England, and only one in Wales and two in Scotland, which has not directly shared in the benefits of the Pure Literature Society, whose operations extend to all our colonies, ever acting upon its motto (Prov. xxiii. 23), "Buy the truth and sell it not."

Clonmel Soldiers' Home.—The way has been opened for securing more convenient premises for the Soldiers' Home at Clonmel. The present building is too small to meet the requirements. Alterations and additions to the new Home will be needed. Miss A. M. Sargint, hon. treasurer, writes: "The work is carried on on purely spiritual lines, and the men can spend their spare time in the Home when out of barracks, and so escape the many temptations that surround them. We rejoice to see how they appreciate even the small house now devoted to their use."

Some Remarkable Bible-Classes.

HAVING for some years felt that one of the great needs of the Church was the consecutive reading and study of both the Old and New Testaments, it was a great joy to us to be brought into contact with the work being done by Mr. W. R. Newell and Dr. James Gray in their Bible classes, spending a week with Mr. Newell and his able assistant, Mr. O. A. Miller, as they went from class to class. Reaching St. Louis, we found at eight o'clock a class of from 1,000 to 1,200 filled the ground floor of the beautiful Odeon Hall. It was very interesting to look into the earnest faces of those people, black and white, rich and poor, young and old, listening eagerly as Mr. Newell, in simple words, reviewed the first fifteen chapters of Matthew, and dwelt especially on the fourteenth chapter. Questions which he asked were replied to as readily and quickly from all parts of the hall as any teacher of a small Sunday-school class could wish for, while the teacher's description of the power, love and patience of Christ drew forth heartfelt ejaculations from some, and went home to the hearts of all.

Next morning we were in Chicago, where the services are held in the Moody Church, and consist of both afternoon and evening meetings. At the afternoon meeting there were from 700 to 800 present. Between the meetings refreshments are provided in the basement of the church, and on this night 725 stayed for this. By the time of the evening meeting, the large church was well filled with an audience of, possibly, 1,800 persons. The subject for study here was 1 Thess. i., and there was the same eagerness to listen and respond as we had seen in St. Louis was witnessed.

At Detroit there is no good hall, so the meetings are held in the Light Guard Armoury, and the programme is very similar to the other places. One of the local ministers, Rev. Marcus Scott, teaches the International Sunday-School Lesson from 7 to 7.30. Then there is a song service of half an hour, and by eight o'clock some 1,500 persons are present to hear Mr. Newell teach lessons from the same chapters in Matthew as in St. Louis, and the teaching has the same effect.

Toronto is next visited. Four o'clock finds every available chair in the basement of the Massey Hall filled with those who are interested to follow Mr. Newell's teachings on "Prayer." Long before eight o'clock every seat in the large hall, seating about 4,000, is taken, hundreds are sitting on the gallery steps or standing, and others have been turned from the doors. The subject is the story of Abraham, and the large class listens with deep interest as Mr. Newell drives home the lessons of faith contained in that life. As usual, from the hall to the station our brethren go, to start off over the 1,600 miles round they make each week. As they have arranged a thirty weeks' course of study, a little calculation will show that if they are spared they will have travelled 48,000 miles, and to accomplish this they spend five nights of every week on board the train, and teach over 9,000 persons each week. Surely God's children everywhere should rejoice in this work, and bear up these brethren in their prayers, that physical health may be granted to enable them to accomplish it.

Messrs. Newell and Miller preach fearlessly the whole counsel of God. They enforce the utter depravity of man, and the eternal punishment of all who reject God's offered mercy, while they teach the absolute necessity of the blood of the atonement for cleansing from sin. God's Word is thus honoured by them, and thus He inclines the people everywhere to gather together to hear it from their lips. Of course, there are bitter adversaries, but, as of old, the common people hear them gladly.

Toronto. WILLIAM HENDERSON.

A Great Preacher.

THE LATE DR. PARKER.

OUR hearts have been touched by the death of Dr. Joseph Parker last Friday afternoon. Among Christian people all over the world there is a sense of personal bereavement, and if, as has been said, Nonconformity has lost one of its great champions, we may truly add that God has called from the region of sense and time one of His foremost witnesses to the men and women of two generations. He was a highly honoured servant of the living God, with a clear and unmistakable message which he faithfully delivered. Sometimes he was the stern reprover of sin, with a trumpet call to repentance; again, and more frequently in later years, he was enabled to lift up Jesus only, tenderly inviting all his hearers within the fold of the Good Shepherd. He was a Nonconformist alike by early training and strong personal conviction, and a Congregationalist because he held firmly that such companies of believers represent not only the ideal of the Early Church, but the most effective method of gathering together the Body of Christ on earth.

He knew the weak spots of his denomination, and his great effort for a closer federation of the elements comprising the English Union has accomplished much more than can be set down in blue-books. While anxious to preserve the complete independence of each congregation in all matters essential to faith and practice, he fully recognised the obligation resting upon the strong to support the weak, and especially of those in richer centres to minister to the spiritual needs of the poor brethren. Very near his heart there always lay the thought of the little gatherings in villages and rural districts, compelled, through no fault of their own, to maintain a continual struggle for very existence. Their right to worship God according to their own conscience he vindicated with all the passion of his great soul, feeling that national and individual well-being were alike involved.

EARLY ENVIRONMENT.

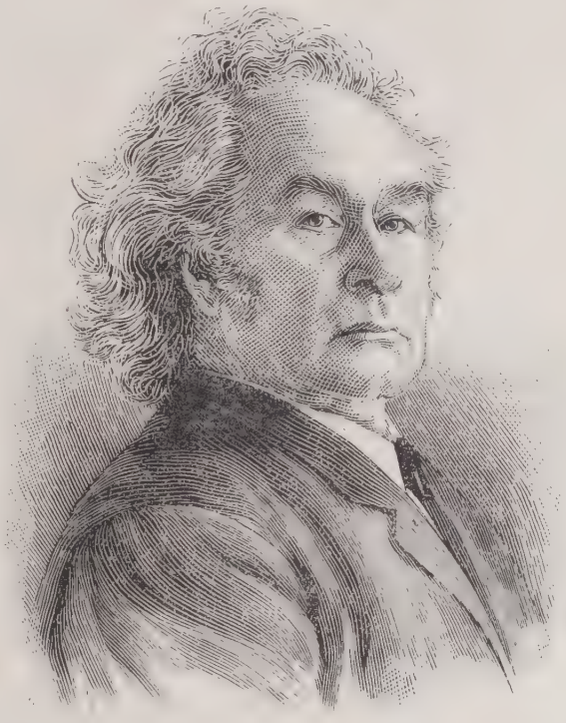
Looking into the circumstances which contributed to the moulding of Dr. Parker's character, we find that the influences brought to bear on him from childhood were favourable to the development of manly qualities, and the effect of them could be traced to the end. He himself described his father as having "the strength of two men and the will of ten, fierce and gentle, with passionateness burning to madness, yet with deepest love of prayer; hating lies as he hated hell itself—with him every man was an angel or a fiend." With his mother the Eternal was a continual presence, and the land of spirits was not far off. "The supernatural was ever to her as real as the natural, and the Bible, with its mystic influence, was of a very truth her daily counsellor. When in difficulty or doubt as to the course of conduct to be pursued, she turned for direction and light to its living pages, and taught her boy to do the same."

Even among his schoolfellows the lad manifested traits of leadership. Reading more widely than any of his companions, he would often puzzle them with sudden questions which showed unusual understanding of the deeper truths of Scripture, and acquaintance with the byways of the Word. Then as later, such questions were not put as mere riddles, but framed so as to convey information by the very asking, and to suggest attractive and profitable subjects of inquiry or study. In the home circle the duties of the Lord's Day included regular attendance twice at school and twice at chapel. The books approved for reading during the remaining hours of the day were carefully chosen, and calculated to foster a somewhat stern Puritan spirit, at the same time laying a foundation of systematic doctrinal knowledge. At twelve years of age he was inclined to "talk" to those of his own age; and a family agreement come to when he was fourteen, to bring him up to follow his father's trade as a mason, very soon proved utterly impracticable. Joseph Parker was marked out by God to be a preacher.

SPIRITUAL CRISIS AND LONGINGS.

Deep religious impressions were satisfactorily brought to a point. Although but recently quoted in our columns, we recall with gratitude the clear terms in which he described his first vision of spiritual things:—

I remember the Sunday night when, walking with my father and a most intelligent Sunday-school teacher, I declared my love to Christ, and asked Him to take my child-heart into His own gracious keeping. The whole scene is ever before me. The two men, father and teacher, explained to me what they knew of the power and grace of Christ, and by many loving words they tempted my tongue into its first audible expression of thought and feeling. It was a summer evening, according to the reckoning of the calendar, but according to a higher calendar it was in very deed a Sunday morning, through whose white light and emblematic dew and stir of awakening life I saw the gates of the Kingdom and the face of the King.



THE LATE DR. PARKER.
From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, London, W.

For over four years he had been recognised as a useful worker among young people when he made his first appearance before a general audience in his eighteenth year. Standing on the cross beams of a saw-pit on the village green of his native Hexham, he denounced sin with great vehemence and energy. This was the beginning of much open-air preaching, which proved acceptable throughout the whole neighbourhood. He was content to go on in this way for four years, but the determination to devote his life to the Christian ministry never relaxed. When he was twenty-two he took the definite step of writing to Rev. Dr. John Campbell, pastor of Whitefield Tabernacle, Moorfields, and editor of the British Banner, asking for counsel in the matter. The letter appears to have conveyed an impression of the strong character behind it, for the reply included an invitation to go to London and preach in the Tabernacle for three weeks.

RECOGNITION OF SPECIAL GIFTS.

That trip to the metropolis marked the greatest turning-point in Dr. Parker's career after his conversion. When the three weeks were over, the young preacher had acquitted himself so well that he was invited to remain as junior colleague to Dr. Campbell. The lack of regular theological college training was at once brushed aside, in view of the good use he had made of all opportunities to cultivate his rich natural gifts. He had already put himself to school in the most effective manner, and he was then coming under the influence of one of the best of his masters. In Dr. Campbell he found a friend peculiarly qualified to guide the ardent young spirit, and during the period they spent together good progress was made in the bringing out of the gifts which bore their ripest fruit in the ministry at the City Temple. Study and pastoral duties left intervals which were utilised in the preparation for the press of "Chapters for Young Thinkers," which appeared in Cassell's Popular Educator.

After only nine months in London, an invitation came to undertake the pastorate at Banbury, and six happy, busy years were spent there. Pen and voice were alike active in the service of the Master. It appears to have been during this period that he formed the ideal of the Christian ministry which he followed to the end. His message, like the Apostle's, was from God; he did not hold his office from men, and he would not be accountable to men for his conduct in it. His next move to Manchester was made only after he had clearly laid down this position. He proved his power alike over rural and city populations. At Banbury he found an empty chapel, which was soon filled to overflowing, an extension soon proving also inadequate. At Manchester the congregation was at a low ebb, but the Word of God preached with power drew together those who were burdened with a sense of sin, until the aspect of affairs was changed.

During these years Dr. Parker was becoming known and admired throughout the country, and when the pulpit of the Poultry Chapel, London, fell vacant through the death of Rev. Dr. James Spence he was asked to fill it. The time did not seem to him ripe for a change, but when the invitation was pressingly renewed a year later he heard the voice of God in it, and in 1869 became the minister of the congregation which has just been bereaved. The removal to the now familiar site on Holborn Viaduct, in 1873, provided the central situation which has permitted of a demonstration of what may be done with a great "mid-town" chapel when the right man is in the pulpit. Dr. Parker was not merely minister of a large London congregation; thousands of people all over the empire regarded themselves as having formed a personal tie while visiting the city.

WORLD-WIDE INFLUENCE.

Dr. Parker's works are so numerous, and have been so widely circulated, that to define his line of teaching would be superfluous. He will, however, be best remembered by "The People's Bible," a monumental work representing much of the labour of eleven years. His latest biographer and close friend of many years, Dr. Adamson, of Windermere, says:—

There runs through the whole of his preaching a firm faith in the inspiration and authority of the Bible, the terrible nature and turpitude of sin, the love of God to our fallen race, the necessity of the Spirit's work in the regeneration of the soul, the supreme Divinity of Jesus Christ, the nature of His Atonement, and the necessity, on the part of the sinner, of faith in Christ for salvation and a righteous life.

The sermons were not constructed on conventional lines. His abrupt questions already alluded to were not the only startling surprises which awaited his hearers. He had a marvellous capacity for making instantaneous changes from one point of view to another of his subject; and his command of the English language enabled him to express truths with a terseness all his own. Those who read sermons they had also heard, often found it difficult to believe that the vivid impressions on their minds had been conveyed in so few sentences. This rare gift of oratory was truly dedicated to the service of God, but Dr. Parker held no narrow view of that service, for public life and opinion in every department have been effected by his utterances.

Dr. Parker was catholic in spirit. All were his brethren who truly loved the Lord. A beautiful compliment was paid to him last spring at the Bradford meetings of the National Free Church Council, the Primitive Methodists, whose turn it was to nominate the President-elect, waiving that right in order that he might be asked to rule over the deliberations at Brighton in 1903. Now another must fill the chair at Brighton, for the nominee has joined the General Assembly and Church of the Firstborn. His opening address to the Council was practically prepared. His wish was that, even in the event of his death, it should be read; and if it be possible to arrange for this, it will be looked forward to as containing the last message of a loved and trusted leader. His plans for the near future included the writing of a paper on "A Generation in a London Pulpit" for the Homiletic Review: but he has left abundant material from which others can tell the story.

An Appreciation:

By Dr. GUINNESS ROGERS.

AS I sit down to write under the full force of the impressions produced by the death of the friend and comrade of many years, I am reminded of the text of a celebrated sermon of Henry Melville's, "Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen." There is, in truth, a solemn and emphatic message to all Christian workers, and especially to all preachers of the Gospel, in the removal of so gifted a teacher, and one filling so conspicuous a place. True, he had passed the limit of three-score years and ten, and had for months been laid aside by a painful illness; which had in itself the sadness of death. But we, who had been so accustomed to see him in the fulness of his vigour, found it hard to believe that the end of such a career was at hand. I saw him last in July, before leaving home for the summer, and though I knew that the affection of the heart, from which he suffered, had in it a menace that could not be slighted, I found it hard to realize that he had completed his work. I tried, but in vain, to dissuade him from attempting the resumption of his work in September. His heart was set upon it. Alas! it proved too much for his strength, and we mourn to-day the loss of another of the most able representatives of our British Christianity.

Dr. Parker's telegraphic address was "Preacher." As a preacher he desired to be known, and in that office he had few rivals, certainly no superior. Far be it from me to try and determine Dr. Parker's place in the galaxy of pulpit luminaries. "Star differeth from star in glory." Let him have his own, without endeavouring to estimate the exact degree of radiance he attained.

It was impossible to hear him without recognising the presence of a man of genius. A hearer might be out of sympathy with him, and, that being the case, might take exception to many points in his thought, his style, his delivery. But he must have been prejudiced, indeed, if he refused to recognise the mark of genius in all. Take these points in order.

His thinking was never common-place. His path might be eccentric, but it was original. Few things were more remarkable than the sudden and unexpected light he would often throw upon the most familiar passage of Holy Scripture. His "People's Bible" is really a marvel, and a marvel because it contains the great thoughts of one who had read closely and thought deeply, and who, above all, was untrammelled by theories of the schools or the authority of the scribes. As with the volumes, so also with the sermons. They were full of fresh, vigorous, spiritual thought—the lesson learned in a life of varied experience, as well as the results of varied and extensive reading.

The same may be said of his style. Often rough and ragged, and with little consideration for the received tradition, it was always striking, and at times overpowering, in its vehemence and force. There was nothing for which he had less respect than the dignity of the pulpit, and in truth he seemed to find a pleasure in setting all such considerations at defiance. He was and the power which he wielded over them made him an object of interest to those whose own taste might have preferred a different style of address. Preachers came to his Thursday services—including clergymen of the Established Church—in order that they might study preaching. Here was a man who was doing what so many gifted men failed to do—laying hold upon the thought and feeling of great congregations. They wanted to learn the secret, and if they could not attain the same power, at least they gained some higher conception of their office and of the work to which their lives were given.

His delivery was his own. Like most eminent men he had his imitators, but it may safely be said in this case, even more than in most others, the imitation was a miserable caricature. For he had extraordinary dramatic power, which any copyist might be defied to reproduce. It was a natural gift, but it had undoubtedly been carefully cultivated, and was so used as to produce remarkable effects. Suffice it to say, the delivery added to the power of the discourse. The passionate vehemence, even if objectionable from the rhetorician's point of view, was an expression of the earnestness of the man. The audience felt that the preacher meant what he said, and there is no more important element of power than that.

I heard from a friend of mine of a remark made to him by a distinguished dignitary of the Anglican Church, who had been listening, along with him, to a Congregational preacher. "It was like Dissenters' sermons generally—it aimed at effect." For my own part, I only wished that it were true of all our preachers and all their sermons. Sermons are surely to produce effect, or preaching is a mere function to be discharged with as much elegance and dignity as it is possible to command. That was not my friend's view, as it cannot be the view of any true preacher. He believed that the pulpit was the Divine instrument for the salvation of the world, and his whole action was shaped on that belief.

He was a signal illustration of the truth that the preacher is born, not made. It would not be easy to find one who owed less to training, more to the Divine gift that was in him. Whether he would have been the better for more discipline is a point which it would be profitless to discuss. Certain it is that his freedom from all conventionalism gave a singular freshness to his teachings which was extremely attractive.

But the freshness was in the mode of presentation only. No man has less sympathy with the cuckoo cry of a Gospel for the times; he had felt more of the Zeit-geist than most men; but the only effect on him was to give such wide knowledge and large sympathy that he understood how to meet the generation on its own platform and preach to it in its own tongue the wonderful works of God. But about those wonderful works there was, there could be, no variety. He was a firm believer in the old Gospel, as he never scrupled to proclaim under all conditions. Only a few years ago he summoned a and his intimate friends knew how earnestly his heart was set upon maintaining in the strongest possible way the preaching of the Cross. With an intensity of earnestness he ever contended for the faith once delivered unto the saints. His contention, however, was for the most part more for the positive assertion of the truth than an attempt to expose error.

He was an extremely interesting personality, not the less so because of the seeming inconsistencies which often made him a puzzle, not only to the world but even to his own friends and admirers. The very caused him to be regarded with strong feelings on one side or the other. What was more curious, the same individuals who at one time were his severest critics would at another, and under different conditions, speak as his most ardent friends. His character was of a composite order, and whatever feature was prominent was sure to be strongly developed. His work, especially in London, remains his best monument. The City Temple is one of the landmarks of London Nonconformity, and was itself a striking manifestation of his bold and daring genius. But the most memorable feature in connection with it was the Thursday morning service, surely one of the most remarkable gatherings in this great city. The conception was his own, and it was worked out with ardent zeal and untiring diligence. The man who could gather such a company during the business hours of the day, and conduct a service which maintained its popularity and its influence for more than thirty years, was no ordinary man. May his memory be blessed!

A GRATEFUL REMINISCENCE.

A YOUNG journalist writes: "Only once did I meet Dr. Parker in private, and then in much fear and trembling. It fell to my lot to pay him an uninvited visit on a matter of business in which I desired to enlist his interest. Shown into the drawing-room, I more than anticipated a curt dismissal for my presumption. To my pleasant surprise I was conducted to his study, to find the doctor busy at his desk; and, as he laid down his pen, my fears were dispelled by his kindly greeting: 'Come in, my dear boy. I have heard of you, and am glad to meet you. Bring that easy chair to the fire and sit down.'

"Wheeling his own chair into line he chatted for half an hour in his brightest and most genial mood. His strong leonine face relaxed into the gentleness of a child, and as he talked I could have thrown my arms around him and kissed him for his fatherly sympathy and courteous consideration.

"My 'business' was unsuccessful, but my interview is a grateful memory, for, as I left, my heart was filled with a cheer that no money could buy."

Postmen and Postal Clerks.—The Postal and Telegraph Christian Association has its senior work headquarters in Bartholomew Close, E.C., and has branches both in the United Kingdom and many foreign lands. The object of the work is to bring the Gospel to bear upon the lives of the postmen and postal and Telegraph clerks in every part of the world. In addition there are in London resting and reading-rooms, where the weary postmen can rest in the intervals between their duties, their own homes in the suburbs being too far away. There are also meetings and Bible classes held here for postmen and telegraphists. The hon. treasurer is Colonel Elliot, P.T.C.A. Senior Institute, 17, Bartholomew Close, E.C.

London's Barefoot Bairns.

INFLUENCING as it does through its large staff of voluntary helpers thousands of the poorest children in the land, particularly the cripples, the badly-fed, and the ill-clad, the Ragged School Union is peculiarly fitted to deal with the keen suffering which at present prevails among the poor.

The organization includes many departments which minister to the needs of the little ones, and is remarkable for its vitality and vigorous endeavour to meet and solve the varied problems which arise from time to time in connection with child-life. At present much effort is being put forth to gather in the children of the streets, and by means of bright lantern services to help preserve them from the taint of hooliganism.

With the coming of winter, however, special attention is directed to the sorrows of the ragged and bootless children whose sufferings are brought to light by the teachers in the Board Schools. By means of the Union's "Barefoot Mission" the needs of such children are met quickly and well.

To read a sheaf of typical applications from the teachers is in itself a liberal education as to the conditions under which the children of slumdom exist. They reveal a state of grinding misery which must surely appeal to the sympathies of Christian people.

STORIES OF REAL LIFE.

A head teacher writes of one of her pupils:—"The sadness of the case will, I hope, excuse my troubling you. E. S. is an orphan. The father died eight years and the mother ten months ago of consumption, and all the children are delicate. It is a most deserving case; she is very regular in attendance, and is an intelligent girl."

It is said of another lad, aged eleven:—"His father sells crumpets, when well enough. He is consumptive, and so is the child. The mother does umbrella elastics at 1d. per gross." What a comfort to these poor people to have the boy fitted with a suit, hose, vest, and boots.

It would be easy to multiply examples. Another appeal is for boots, stockings, and trousers, for a lad of thirteen, "mother a washerwoman earning very little, the father has been a lunatic these six years, and there are four in family." Of another poor lad urgently needing boots, it is said, "his father used to be a watchman, but broke his ankles, and cannot now work. His mother had a stall in the market, and kept the house going and the children clothed. She now has dropsy, and cannot live long."

"KISSED THE BOOTS."

Hetty M—— is a little blind girl, whose father is dead, and her mother very poor. Her teacher wrote acknowledging the gift of a pair of boots: "Thank you so much for the boots. It was good of you to send them so soon. Hetty was so delighted that she actually kissed them."

Such instances are typical of hundreds, so that great numbers of parcels of warm clothing and boots are being despatched daily to the homes of the ragged and barefooted. And it must be remembered that it is in no sense a secular work. It is undertaken in the Master's name, and is rendered possible by the gifts of His people. Much has been done in the way of relief, but applications are pouring in. To deny them is a pitiable thing, but to satisfy them must necessarily entail considerable expenditure. In conclusion, let the following pleading words from a teacher in East London speak as to the extent of the need:—"I have filled in some forms of application, and trust that you will not think I have asked too much. The children here are of the poorest class, and on a wet day there are not a dozen that have dry feet." And the same teacher wrote at a later date: "I am very grateful for the boots and clothes. The poor children are delighted, and the improvement in their appearance is wonderful. Some of the parents wish you to know how thankful they are."

The secretary of the "R.S.U.," Mr. John Kirk, may be addressed at 32, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

King Edward Schools.

THE Hon. Evelyn Ashley presided at the fifty-seventh annual meeting of this institution at Albert Street, Spitalfields, when there was a full audience. Mr. Charles Montague, the honorary superintendent, read the report, which recalled the fact that the late Lord Shaftesbury in the forties opened the cowshed which for some time served as a school house. Reference was made to the late Earl's forty years' presidency, and to the favour extended to the work by the late Queen and the Duchess of Teck.

To-day, the Sunday-schools contain 1,500 children, and 400 young people attend the Sunday and week-night Bible-classes; the Bible-Reading Association has 480 members; while the Mothers' Meeting had 600 members. The children's week-night services are also well maintained. Girls are taught plain needlework, cutting out, dress-making, knitting, darning, wool work, and cookery, to know which proves to be a great boon. Boys are also attracted from pernicious amusements by having an opportunity to learn carpentry, cabinet-making, fretwork, and singing, a gymnasium being provided for their physical exercise.

The chief event of the year was the acquisition of the Holiday Home at Sandon, Essex, which has five acres of land attached. Mr. J. G. Johnson, a vice-president of the Mission, paid the whole of the builder's contract—£1,515. During last summer 240 persons enjoyed the benefit of the Home.

Mission services for preaching the Gospel are well maintained; and as the Report said: "For many years past it has been our good fortune to secure the help of friends possessing the fitness for this special work, among whom are many connected with the London City Mission, Harley College, Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, &c. Three services are held weekly. Bright, cheerful singing we find to be a ready means of reaching the hearts of the people."

The Hon. Evelyn Ashley congratulated the managers on having had a good year. He was struck with the way in which Ragged-school teachers had adapted themselves to circumstances. There were great difficulties at first; then the State came in with education. Did the volunteer teachers give up? They turned the Ragged-school centres into institutes, which made the desert blossom as the rose. If it had not been for such efforts the empire could not have been maintained. It was a marvel that London should be kept in order by so small a police force, but it is impossible to over-estimate the restraining influences of such work as is done by this and similar missions. Mr. Ashley mentioned that at his home in Hampshire, he had a man who had worked in the garden for seventy-four years. Sir T. F. Buxton also spoke of the devotion of the teachers to their work, all of which tended to the glory of God. Other addresses followed.

It is anything but reassuring to find that a hard winter is being anticipated in and about Spitalfields on account of so many persons being out of work. The continued invasion of the East End by foreign aliens, who live under conditions of hardship, overcrowding, and squalor, incredible to contemplate, adds difficulties to the situation with which Mr. Montague and his helpers will have to cope, or distress may become acute.

Barnwell Mission, Cambridge.—The twenty-fourth anniversary of the Barnwell Theatre Royal Mission was celebrated a few days ago by a social gathering and public meeting, when the officers were cheered by the presence of a large number of friends. The superintendent, Mr. W. K. Vawser, presented a report which was full of encouragement. It showed that the work had been prosecuted with unflagging energy and devotion. The fruitful results which have followed are a stimulus to all who share the responsibility of the undertaking. Rev. W. R. Mowll, presiding, spoke words of hearty sympathy with the Mission, and Mr. C. H. Piper, the vice-president, pointed to the encouraging fact that the attendance during the last twelve months had increased from ninety-five to 250. Among others who took part were Revs. A. Hart, C. Joseph, and C. W. Wilson.

The Children's Home.

CONSIDERABLE strain has been thrown upon those in charge of the Children's Home and Orphanage, whose chief offices are at Bonner Road, London, N.E., and whose branches are distributed through the country by the very generosity of some of its friends.

A Liverpool lady has promised the sum of £20,000 for the founding of a new branch somewhere in the North of England. This will provide eventually for 300 additional children, but, of course, it involves an increase in income of several thousands a year.

Mr. Joshua Locke, of Southport, and Mr. John Cory, of Cardiff, have promised £500 each if an additional £4,000 be secured for the erection of a Cripple and Convalescent Home by the sea—a gift again that necessitates an increase in the annual income in order that such a branch, which is sorely needed, may be maintained. The whole of the sum allocated by the Wesleyan Methodist Twentieth Century Fund must, by the terms of the fund, be devoted to the erection of new buildings. It is estimated, therefore, that an increase of £2,000 per annum will be required for the next five years.

In view of the increasing demands of the most pitiable character for admission of destitute and crippled children, and also of the generous gifts above referred to, an earnest appeal is made for annual subscriptions, however small, towards the funds of the Home. They should be addressed to the Principal, Rev. Dr. Gregory, the Children's Home, Bonner Road, London, N.E. There are already 1,250 boys and girls under the shelter of the Home, and it is expected that within the next few months the number will be increased by nearly 100 children.

Twenty-five Years in New Cut.

MANY changes have taken place in the neighbourhood of New Cut since Messrs. T. and J. Young commenced to wage an unrelenting war against sin and all that tends to keep the people in a state of poverty and misery. Numerous as the changes have been, however, the need for aggressive evangelistic work is as urgent as ever.

A quarter of a century has passed since the formation of the Working-Men's Mission. Each year has had its record of converts, and with the growth of the Mission there has been a corresponding deepening of the zeal of the workers. A branch mission was opened in York Street, Walworth, some years ago, and another in Bermondsey, where the efforts made have been followed with encouraging results. At each of the centres the various gatherings have attracted large congregations, and many cheering testimonies are continually being received, showing how widely the labours of the workers have been owned and prospered of God.

Each evening there is a meeting of some sort in the Mission Hall. The proclamation of the Gospel is always given the primary place, but almost every means of raising and helping those who are not able to help themselves have been adopted. New Cut unfortunately has still its Sunday morning market, and hundreds swarm its broad roadway. Some are shopping, some are waiting for the public-houses to open, while others are out because it is the usual thing for them to do on the Sabbath.

There was a time when the crowd was possessed by stolid indifference to the claims of Christ, and when the workers had to rally their forces to maintain their position in the open air. This has given place to a state of unconcern and negligence, which is no less difficult to cope with. Poverty abounds, and side by side with the preaching of the Gospel, efforts are being made to alleviate the temporal needs of the poor. Last winter some 100,000 meals were supplied at a nominal cost, and 3,000 were given free. As the season again approaches, it is hoped that many hearts will once more be gladdened by gifts suitable to their needs. The superintendents of the Mission are Messrs. Thomas and James Young, 33, Nelson Square, Blackfriars Road, S.E.

Dublin Medical Mission.—We have often spoken well, from personal knowledge, of this good and useful work. A special effort is being made to raise the much-needed sum of £100. Two friends have promised £5 each, and another £2 2s., if the whole is secured within a reasonable time.

Foreign Mission Week.

A TRIP TO PERSIA.

We pick up our geography books, and read "Persia is a large country, about ten times the size of England, and is ruled by a despotic Shah. More than one-third of Persia is a great salt desert, and about one-fourth of its people are plundering nomadic tribes." We may soon learn this information off by heart, but I am afraid it will not make us much wiser concerning Persia or the Persians! Perhaps this week we can find out something regarding this country which is not to be discovered in geography books; at any rate, we will try.

Most of the people in Persia to-day are Mohammedans; that is, followers of Mohammed, whom we know as "the False Prophet." Their sacred book is called the Koran, and the teachings contained in it lead the people into many errors. The Mohammedans believe in God, but they do not think of Him as we do; and Mohammed is their teacher, not Jesus Christ. They believe that the only possible way of gaining God's favour is by accepting their faith, and wherever they go they try to force that religion on the inhabitants, even at the point of the sword. In days gone by thousands of men and women have been slain because they refused to accept the Mohammedan faith. How different this is to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, which is God's gift of eternal life, and while all are urged to accept it, is forced upon none.

The Mohammedan hates the Christian, and speaks of him as a "dog." He will not eat from the same dish without first washing it, and often when a missionary visits their houses a special piece of carpet will be spread upon the floor for him to sit on, which will afterwards be burnt as "unclean." You can understand that this treatment makes the missionary's work in Persia very difficult, and for a Mohammedan to confess Christ means persecution, and, it may be, death. I wonder how we should get on there, if we are so afraid to confess Christ in our homes lest we should be laughed at or called "goody-goody!"

As you are "Bible Searchers," a trip to Persia should be of special interest to you, for it is one of the oldest countries mentioned in the Bible. The north of Persia was first called Media, after Madai, Noah's grandson, and perhaps you will remember Chedorlaomer, who carried away Lot as a captive, was King of Elam, a province in Persia (Gen. xiv.). Then if you will turn to Ezra vi. 2 you will find the town of Achmetha mentioned, and there to-day may be seen the tombs of Mordecai and Queen Esther. The modern name of this town is Hamadan, which is derived from "Haman," of whom you also read in the Book of Esther, and the feast which was instituted in memory of the Jews' deliverance from Haman's evil plans, is still kept at Hamadan. Daniel must often have passed through the land, and he was one of those who taught the people to worship the true God, for in those days the inhabitants worshipped the sun and fire, and were called Sabeans. You will find them spoken of in Job i. 15. To-day there are still from 16,000 to 18,000 Sabeans in Persia.

The city of Antioch, in which the followers of Christ were first called "Christians" (Acts xi. 26), was at one time included in the Persian empire. For the most part the Persian Christians of to-day are called Nestorians; they are greatly hated, so much so that they have to build their churches with narrow and low doorways, so that only one person can enter at a time, and he has to stoop. This is to prevent the Mohammedans from stabling their horses in the churches, and thus hindering the worship. How different this is from the ease with which we go to church or chapel, without any fear of persecution or inconvenience. It is so easy that I am afraid children sometimes laugh and talk while there, and even we grown-up people are apt to be very inattentive. What great privileges we have in this Christian land. Let us thank God for them, and make the most of them!

One thing which the Mohammedan is very particular about is prayer. Moslems are bound to repeat their prayers five times a day: at daybreak, noon, before sunset, during the first twilight, and an hour after night has begun. Wherever they may be, the moment they hear the call to prayer they lay aside their work, and begin to repeat their prayers. But they are not really praying at all. It is simply "vain repetition," as the greater number of Moslems in Persia do not even understand the language in which the prayers are written, and have only learnt the words. They are taught that a mistake in form or in position makes the prayer useless, and God will not hear it. As soon as the Moslem has finished his prayer, he returns to his old life of sinful pleasure, of lying, injustice and cruelty.

But I am afraid we sometimes act like Moslems, and utter only "vain repetitions" when we say our prayers.

I often say my prayers,
But do I ever pray?
And do the wishes of my heart
Go with the words I say?

I might as well kneel down
And worship gods of stone,
As offer to the living God
A prayer of words alone.

Our prayers are meant to bring us nearer to God, so that we may speak to Him and He to us, and thus make us quick to see His will and obey it.

Then the Mohammedan believes that a pilgrimage to Mecca will make his entrance into heaven certain, and so he will put himself to a great deal of trouble to get there. That is not Christ's plan, is it? He said: "I am the way, the truth, and the life, no man cometh unto the Father but by Me," and "Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out," and we know that whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish, but have eternal life. We do not need to go on a long pilgrimage to gain an entrance into heaven.

In Persia the women and girls are thought nothing of. They are never taught to read, and unless they come in contact with some Europeans, or a missionary, they stand little chance of learning anything. If they dare to confess Christ, they are almost sure to be beaten by their husbands, and very cruelly treated. But in spite of persecution both men and women, and boys, and girls have been and are still brave enough to stand up boldly for Christ. These instances make the missionaries so glad, for they know that their work is not in vain, and their hearts are filled with joy when they realize that those amongst whom they work are proving that if God be for them, who can be against them, and they are becoming more than conquerors through Him that loved them. In School and Playground. Five-Minute Talks with Young People. By G. E. Morgan, M.A. (Cloth, 1s.; leather, 2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.) Rev. Christian Endeavour Topic.

Sunday, December 7.

Helpers or Hinderers (Num. xiii. 25-33).

YOU must be either a helper or a hinderer. Even not to help is to hinder. He that is not with, is against. Like Israel, the Christian Church is on her march through unkindly and hostile country. There are giants to combat, and walled cities to overthrow.

The giants may stand for powerful intellects and personalities that are doing their worst, through the Press and platform, by the impure photographs and the blasphemous argument, by jibes and jests, by the music they compose and the pictures they paint, to obstruct the reign of Purity and Righteousness. The cities will stand for strong vested interests, such as the drink traffic, the betting ring, and the casino. Against all these the Church is pledged to fight to the death. She must vanquish them, or they will certainly extinguish her.

The Christian Church is as liable as Israel was, to be swept by sudden fears and panics, or be raised to the sublime heights of a victorious courage, before which the hosts of darkness cannot prevail. But which extreme, whether of pessimism or optimism, is being determined by ourselves. We are pessimists or optimists. We hinder or help.

Remember that it was a single voice, raised, probably in jest, to call Fire! Fire! which led to the panic in the Surrey Gardens Music Hall, in the early days of Mr. Spurgeon's popularity—a panic in which five or six people lost their lives. So a single voice, yours or mine, suggesting failure and disaster, magnifying difficulties, counselling delay, may cast discouragement and despair through an entire church. There is always a considerable element of unbelief among even Christian people, which is ready enough to catch at such suggestions, and to give them an altogether fictitious value—just as figures are magnified when seen through a mist; and reports are exaggerated when spread through a dispirited and demoralized host.

Hinderers make these mistakes. They spell giant with a capital G, and God with a small g; whilst helpers do the very reverse. They put circumstances between themselves and God, instead of putting God between themselves and all circumstances and enemies whatsoever. They exaggerate the size of their foes till they seem in their own sight as grasshoppers, instead of contrasting those that are against them with those much larger hosts which are for them.

Everything depends on our standard of measurement. If you compare your Canaanites with yourselves, you may give way to fear; but if you compare them with the everlasting God, you are kept in perfect peace. Hence, when the Psalmist needed help, he refused to look to the hills from which it might come, and insisted on looking to the Lord which made heaven and earth—including mountains and hills—(see Psa. cxxi., marg.).

In every life there are giant sins, and special temptations and difficulties. As we measure our resources against them it seems utterly hopeless to suppose that we can prevail. But turn to the next chapter, verse 8. See the hope that buoyed up Caleb and made him speak as he did. He said, "If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and give it us." That is exactly it. You never can prevail against the strongly-rooted evil of your life; but God will give you the victory.

And when God comes on the scene, having full and unhindered authority in our life, it matters very little whether we have to do with molehills or mountains. From a distance of five miles up in the atmosphere the mountain is but as a molehill. Fix your thoughts on the Eternal God, and ask yourself if He is not able to give you what you cannot conquer. C.E. NOTES.

The Methodist churches have hit upon the happy idea of forming circuit unions of C. E. societies. The U.M.F.C. circuit has such a union, and the first convention under its auspices was recently held.

Christian Endeavourers in Japan are mourning the loss by death of Rev. A. Mizako, who for nine years has held the combined offices of secretary and treasurer of the National C. E. Union of that country. Few men have done more for the movement in Japan than he, and none were more anxious to cultivate a spirit of fellowship among Christian workers of many nationalities labouring in his beloved country.

Madagascar.—The Paris Missionary Society are sending further reinforcements to Madagascar, consisting of one missionary and his wife and two single ladies. One of the latter has had considerable experience as a teacher, while the other hopes to assist in the Lepers' Home at Manankavaly.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, December 14.

The Boy Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 1-14).

Golden Text—1 Sam. iii. 9.

SAMUEL stands next to Moses in conspicuous prominence, as judge and prophet, in the history of God's chosen people; the childhood of both was invested with peculiar interest, and each was called to the service of Jehovah by the Divine voice. With Samuel began the line of prophets in continuous succession (Acts iii. 24, xiii. 20). The schools or colleges of the prophets in his time are the first of which we have any mention in Scripture (1 Sam. x. 5, xix. 20). "These schools continued down to the captivity, and were succeeded by the synagogues, where the doctors gave liberty for any persons to propound questions to them about the law of God. So Jesus at twelve years old (Luke ii. 46). Later at Nazareth (Luke iv. 16, 17). Paul (Acts xxii. 3)."—(Cruden.)

"There was no Open Vision."

Under Eli's lax rule (a) the corrupt practices of his sons, while serving in their priestly office, had brought the services of the Tabernacle into disrepute; (b) the worship of God had declined; (c) the Lord's warnings been disregarded (ii. 27); (d) His blessing withdrawn; and (e) the nation had fallen under the oppression of the Philistines. When the men failed, the Lord called Samuel to carry on His great purposes.

Cradled in the arms of a loving mother.
Consecrated early to the Lord.
Reared in the Tabernacle of Jehovah.
Taught in the Divine laws and ordinances.
Trained in the service of the High Priest.
(1 Sam. i, 27, 28; ii. 1-10, 11, 18; iii. 15.)

Loving and willing.	Devoted and teachable.
Attentive and obedient.	Humble and faithful.

Steadfast and truthful, but very tender-hearted. Though the task given to him was painful, he was no coward (15, 18). Divine revelation did not make him negligent of common work (v. 15). Three calls following did not make him impatient (v. 9).

Eli the aged priest and judge. A man of high privileges, with grand opportunities of serving God and the nation as High Priest, and father of the attendant priests. He failed in discipline over his sons, and allowed a weak tenderness towards them to overbalance his sense of duty towards God (1 Sam ii. 29). It was his sons who committed the sins, but God held Eli responsible, for "he heard," and he knew, but did not restrain them in their iniquity (13; ii. 25). If parents are responsible for the wrong-doing of their children, then discipline is an absolute necessity. A father that loves his son chastens him (Pro. xiii. 24).

Lessons.

1. Happy the child who, like Samuel, hears, listens, and obeys the voice of God in early life! The Lord has work still for children to do. The little boy who "opened the doors of the house of the Lord" when he was a man stood before the altar of God. "Faithful in a very little" (Luke xix. 17).

2. No child is too young to "listen heavenward." A watchful listening to God's call, clean hands (Psa. xxiv. 4), and willing heart (Psa. li. 10). "Keep the windows of your heart open towards heaven."

3. "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Samuel delivered God's message. A telegram may be of grave importance, and the messenger may be small; but he must be faithful in delivery. The Lord will give every listening child some message to carry for Him. "Here am I, send me." Note 2 Kings v. 3; a little girl. God's purpose with the lad Joseph (Gen. xlv. 8). "Out of the mouth of babes thou hast perfected praise" (Matt. xxi. 16).

4. How does God speak to a child now? Bible, sermons, S.S. Lesson, parents, friends, sickness, sorrows, and joys.

5. Samuel must have seen the wicked ways of Hophni and Phineas, but the Lord taught him to walk a clean path. "He will keep the feet of His saints" was a verse in his mother's Song of Praise (ii. 9). "Able to keep you from falling."

S.S. Lesson Illustrations.

A MODERN SAMUEL.

A tourist in the eastern counties was recently looking at a small ivy-covered Norman church, when a boy approached and offered to show him over the building. A few inquiries revealed the fact that in the ingenuous lad the tourist had discovered a real present-day Samuel. He loved the Lord's house, and took a genuine pride in cleaning the brasswork and trimming the lamps of the sanctuary. The lad was so full of joy in the service of the Lord that the visitor involuntarily called him "Samuel." So did the child Samuel minister unto the Lord, and in the lesson, ere the lamp of God went out in the temple, he laid down to sleep (vv. 1-3).

CALLED BY GOD.

During the Scottish persecution of 1547, John Knox fled to the fortress of St. Andrews for safety. One Sunday, while he was there, the preacher to the garrison ascended the pulpit, and, turning to Knox, charged him in God's Name to take upon him the public office of preaching the ancient Gospel. The audience shouted their approval, and Knox, bursting into tears, rushed out of the church and shut himself in his room. There for days did he wrestle with the question whether it was indeed the call from God. Eventually the indomitable reformer accepted, under constraint of conscience, the call to be a minister of the Lord. As with Samuel, John Knox did not at once recognise the voice of God, neither was the Word of the Lord yet revealed to him. When he was assured that the call came from above, he obeyed.

LED BY A CHILD.

Dr. Kitto, through the intemperance of his father, was compelled, when quite a lad, to become an inmate of Plymouth workhouse. While there he used to make and mend list shoes, and for his work received a penny a week. That penny was expended on mental food, which he procured from a bookstall in the market-place of Devonport, two miles distant. By his determination he was able to educate himself and eventually to become a useful missionary. Afterwards he ranked as an eminent Oriental scholar, and by means of his many works on the Scriptures the pauper lad has since been able to lead vast numbers of Biblical students into a better and fuller knowledge of God and His Word. God spake, and a little child did lead Israel.

BETRAYING A TRUST.

A railway-man was recently relating his experiences and referring to the carelessness too often displayed by those engaged on train lines. In one instance, several men had been employed on the metals, and a flagman was posted to give warning of the approach of any trains. While working, one of the men happened to glance over his shoulder and saw, to his horror, that an express was upon them. With a yell he warned his comrades, and they all jumped for their lives. Not one was injured, though their hammers and other tools were broken and scattered right and left. It was subsequently discovered that the flagman, being weary, had fallen asleep in a neighbouring shelter, and so had endangered the lives of many men. The sons of Eli were as flagmen to Israel, and by their sinful failure were risking the safety of a nation.

Welsh Notes.

IT is gratifying to know that the Young People's Christian Union of Wales is making satisfactory progress. An important recent accession to its fellowship is that of the Morriston Sunday School Union. This addition consists of fourteen churches with nineteen Sunday-schools.

The annual meeting of the Cardiff and District Free Church Council has been held at Cardiff, and the report submitted by the secretary was of a most cheering character. The Girls' Guild is already highly successful, and has a membership of nearly 400. The probability is that if the guild continues to prosper the services of a paid secretary will be necessary.

The annual meetings of the Cardiff Y.M.C.A. were held on Tuesday, November 11. The Bishop of Llandaff presided. The report of the secretary was, on the whole, very cheering. The accommodation for juniors had been outgrown, while the boarders' rooms were always full. The debt of £315 in 1901 had been reduced to £37. Towards the debt of £4,000 on the building, Mr. John Cory has offered £1,000, Mr. Richard Cory £500, and Mr. Clifford Cory £100, if the remainder can be raised.

A memorial tablet to the late Dr. Frederick Evans has just been unveiled at Ammanford, Carmarthenshire. Dr. Evans was a distinguished Baptist minister, who spent many years of his ministerial service in the United States. Some years ago when pastor of an important Baptist church in Milwaukee, Dr. Evans' health broke down, and he retired to this country. After his death his American admirers decided to erect a memorial at Ammanford, where the pastor they loved and honoured lies buried. Several Welsh Baptist ministers were present upon the occasion of the unveiling ceremony, and delivered addresses.

Rev. J. Gregory Mantle arrived at Bombay on November 8. On the morning of Lord's Day, November 9, he preached in the Bowen Memorial Church, and in the evening in the Wesleyan Church, Colaba Causeway. Addresses were also given on the following days of the week in the Y.W.C.A. Hall. Mr. Mantle's visit is arousing much interest in India, and his words of counsel and stimulus are being deeply appreciated.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

BELFAST.

THE number of pledges obtained during the Mission conducted by Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry and Mr. Armon Jones at Belfast was 1,372, and the number of persons directly addressed must be in the neighbourhood of 18,000.

The mission had far-reaching effects. The Witness, in the course of a powerful editorial, says:—"We have never seen more earnest or more enthusiastic hearers; and we know well that multitudes of them will become centres of influence in their homes, in their social circles, and in places of work and business; and that chords already struck will vibrate for years to come in directions we are not able to foresee. Workers have been strengthened, stimulated, inspirited; waverers have been persuaded to take their stand, and many have taken heart of grace, and dared to be of hope.

"It was felt that the cause of temperance was placed in a position as an integral part of the work of the Church, that members had to decide between that which made for the perdition of men, and that which made for their salvation; that the drink curse would exist until the Church said it must cease, and that every patriot and philanthropist and Church member was judicially blind who did not see in the traffic and the drinking custom the menace and peril of industrial, social, national, and ecclesiastical life.

"None of all the meetings was more hopeful than that of the school children, which filled completely the Wellington Hall. Indeed, its very magnitude was a difficulty. It represented the effort to reach the children of the day-schools and the Sabbath-schools.

"America has 30,000,000 citizens living in 'dry,' or in prohibition, territory to-day, because she has 20,000,000 boys and girls in the public schools instructed as to the nature of alcohol and its necessary and natural effects upon human life and character. Rev. David A. Taylor's declaration that as a Commissioner of National Education he would do his best to have a similar course of instruction given in Irish National schools was received with hearty cheering. It is hoped that the National School teachers of Belfast, and the superintendents of Sabbath-schools, will adopt the programme of instruction drawn up by the General Assembly's Committee on Temperance, in order that a similar meeting may be held next summer for the distribution of prizes and certificates.

"Dr. Henry is an orator of the first rank, and he has dedicated his gift to a cause of the first importance, and to which he has rendered almost unparalleled services. Mr. Jones is a most worthy colleague, whose voice carried messages of hope and inspiration to thousands."

DUBLIN.

On November 27, Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones commenced a mission in Dublin. At the inaugural public meeting, in the Metropolitan Hall, a large number of ministers and other friends were present. Rev. Dr. Kingsmill Moore, who presided, warmly welcomed the missioners, and referred in hearty terms to Dr. Henry's meetings in Dublin in February last.

Dr. Henry followed with a telling address in the course of which he dwelt on the power of enthusiasm in the cause, and made an earnest appeal on behalf of temperance in the home.

Meetings were held in the same building on Friday afternoon and evening last. The Sabbath was a great day for temperance. In the morning Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones were at the Centenary Methodist Church, St. Stephen's Green; in the afternoon at the Metropolitan Hall; and in the evening at Rutland Square Presbyterian Church. Crowded buildings and deep attention testified to the interest that was aroused. Dr. Henry's messages were powerful, and Mr. Jones added much to the effect by his superb singing. Dr. Henry was also present at a crowded meeting at the Y.M.C.A., when several young men decided for Christ. Meantime Mr. Jones visited the Welsh church, and sang to the congregation. We hope to give particulars of the later meetings in next week's issue.

Dr. Torrey in Madras.

AN instructive instance was afforded at Madras of the direct leading of God in the evangelistic tour which Dr. R. A. Torrey and Mr. Charles Alexander are now making in India. In was not known till they reached Colombo whether they could include the city in their programme. The notice given to the local workers was very short, the dates being fixed only four days before the mission began. The weather conditions proved unfavourable. "The monsoon," says the Bombay Guardian, "was 'up to time,' and was overpoweringly in evidence during those four days—in one night over five inches of rain fell, and nine inches in the twenty-four hours."

The first night of the mission was wet, but the Memorial Hall was two-thirds full. On all the succeeding evenings the attendance was very large, and on the closing nights the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. The audiences consisted of Europeans and Eurasians, with a large admixture of natives both Christian and non-Christian.

Results of the most satisfactory nature are manifest on every hand, though no attempt at tabulation of numbers has been made or encouraged. Many have surrendered to the Lord either for the first time or in the return of the backsliding. The hearts of the Lord's people are glad, and they are content that "the day" should declare what hath been wrought.

THIRTY PRAYER CIRCLES.

Dr. Torrey gave a series of morning Bible readings at which the subjects were: "How to Pray," "Hindrances to Prayer," "Soul Winning," "The Baptism of the Holy Ghost." These were felt to be most heart-searching, helpful, and inspiring. To not a few Christian workers the mission will mean the commencement of a new era in their life and service. Though the mission is over, the Revival for which so many had been praying has begun. There is "the sound of abundance of rain" in the spiritual world, as there has been in the material world. There are those who feel that the time to favour Madras "Yea, the set time is come;" and not Madras only but the whole of India. Prayer circles are being formed in the city, after the manner of those in Melbourne, to wait on God for the outpouring of His Spirit.

Rev. R. J. Ward writes:—"It was a great time, with very blessed results, which are still going on and multiplying." He adds that at the time of writing the prayer circles established in the city numbered about thirty.

GREAT MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

It has been a source of deep satisfaction to many friends that Dr. Torrey has been able to accept an invitatiou to attend the Fourth Decennial Missionary Conference, December 11-17. This is regarded as a direct answer to prayer, and our readers are asked to wait upon God that these days of fellowship may truly be a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Five hundred or more missionaries are expected from all parts of India, Burma, and Ceylon.

Much of the time of the Conference must naturally be given up to the discussion of methods and prospects of work; but it will be a very welcome transition to pass from these to the consideration of the power which alone can make them effective. Those who join in the concert of prayer may be privileged to have a share in a wave of blessing, which shall spread from Madras as a centre to the furthest limits of our great Eastern Dependency, and thus reach great numbers of our fellow-subjects.

About Books.

CHURCH HISTORY.

A work that will be specially welcome to students has been provided by Professor J. W. Moncrief, of the University of Chicago—A Short History of the Christian Church. (5s. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.) Supplying a general and connected view of the whole subject, it aims to meet the wants of beginners in the study, and also of such as desire an outline within the compass of a single volume. Those who may wish to take up a period or some special line of investigation may begin here; those who can go no further, will find Professor Moncrief's treatment comprehensive as well as succinct.

On several counts we commend this work. The facts are well arranged; controverted points are dealt with judiciously; and a tone befitting the subject rules throughout. As far as possible, technical terms are avoided. The author is obviously master of his subject, and the bibliographical lists given at the head of the various sections are fairly representative and of practical value. The student who begins with this book will assuredly begin well.

"One by One" (4s. 6d. per 100. Morgan & Scott) is an admirable booklet, explaining the method of personally seeking individual souls, which has already been crowned with blessing in many quarters.

Arnold's Practical Sabbath-School Commentary on the International Lessons, 1903 (2s. 6d. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.), proves on examination to be a comprehensive handbook, brimful of useful hints, suggestions, illustrations, and outlines.

The young people who regularly find profit and entertainment in the pages of Our Own Magazine, will heartily welcome the annual volume of their favourite. Carefully edited and beautifully illustrated, this capital volume will be treasured in many a Christian home. (2s. Children's Special Service Mission.)

The Christmas number of The British Monthly contains, among other good things, a fully illustrated sketch of Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. A supplementary folio contains fine photogravures of John, Charles, and Susannah Wesley, whose life and work are outlined in a very readable article. Every page of the number is of interest. (1s. net. Hodder & Stoughton.)

A large variety of healthy reading is provided in the Young Woman (5s. Horace Marshall & Son). The stories have been well chosen, and the class of women would be hard to find who could not find something of deep interest in these pages. A special feature has been made of portraits of prominent persons. Fashion notes, hints on hygiene and household matters, and travel papers, are all alike fresh and well written.

Hazell's Annual. In view of the late Session of Parliament, and the desirability of giving a record of the proceedings with regard to the Education Bill and other important matters, the proprietors of "Hazell's Annual" have decided to publish the 1903 edition on January 20, and not, as in previous years, early in December. This alteration of date will enable the "Annual's" "doubled-distilled extract" of the news and events of the year, at home and abroad, to cover the whole year ending December 31, 1902. All future editions will similarly be issued early in January of each year.

Among young and old there will be found appreciative readers of The Story of a Living Temple: A Study of the Human Body. By Frederick M. Rossiter, B.S., M.D., and Mary Henry Rossiter, A,M. (3s. 6d. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.) To-day, as well as long ago, "people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." In these pages an attempt is made, in simple fashion, to show the physical basis of health and happiness and morality. The body is viewed from the highest standpoint, and along with information regarding physiology and hygiene, principles of self-respect and duty are forcibly inculcated. Under the figure of a temple, or a building in which God is to be worshipped, the body is pictured and its parts and faculties explained in an interesting manner. This book deserves many readers; we trust it will have them, and thus be a means of much good in many a family circle.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

The Weaver Brothers.

THESE well known evangelists commenced a week's mission in the Primitive Methodist church, at West Walton, on November 16. The crowd was so great that the schoolroom was opened and filled with an overflow. Every week-night the church has been crowded. A most gracious work was seen; the inquiry room has been filled with the anxious. Already there has been a large application for church membership. Their visit was the means of a wondrous awakening in the whole district. C.

Dr. Harry Guinness at Dalston, N.

An inspiring fortnight's mission at Dalston Junction Baptist Church, N., has just been concluded. The missioner was Dr. Harry Guinness. He was greatly helped by the singing of Miss Frost, who came specially from Ireland. Over 260 passed through the inquiry room, the majority of whom had not previously been connected with any church. Night after night the "rank outsider" was to be seen at the meetings, especially at the two lectures for men, and it was felt that the very class it was most desired to reach had been successfully gathered in. R. O. Johns, Pastor.

Opera House, Crouch End, N.

The evangelistic meetings which are being held at the Opera House, Crouch End, N., on Lord's Day evenings (following on the recent fruitful mission by Gipsy Smith) are attended by manifest tokens of Divine blessing. On the last two Sundays Mr. Henry Varley was the evangelist, and his striking addresses have been listened to by very large audiences with eager attention. On Sunday evening last, though the weather was extremely unpropitious, there were very few empty seats in the capacious building. Mr. Varley's subject was "Death—and Afterwards," and his powerful appeals to heart and conscience were used by the Holy Spirit to the conviction of many souls, who were subsequently led to decision for Christ.

Mr. Charles Noakes at Whitehaven.

Although there had been several very helpful missions conducted in Whitehaven during the year, "there remaineth much to be done." The committee of Hogarth Church had secured the services of Mr. Charles Noakes (of the Evangelization Society) for a fifteen-days' mission. Mr. Noakes, who was the first Lay Agent at the old West Strand Mission, was thus no stranger to Whitehaven folk, and accordingly got to work at once. The addresses from first to last were very heart-searching, convincing, and persuasive, Sinners sought the Saviour, backsliders were restored, and God's people quickened. Notwithstanding many drawbacks, the congregations were very good, and on Sundays the church was filled to its utmost capacity. We thank God for this visit. G. E. Dutson.

Mr. Wm. M. Oatts in Falkirk.

Under the auspices of the Falkirk United Fellowship Associations, Mr. Oatts has conducted a fortnight's evangelistic mission. The meetings began on Sabbath, November 9, and were held in the large parish church. There were other three missions going on in the town at the same time, hence the meetings were not large, but there has been manifest blessing. On each of the three Sabbath days there were four and five services held, and large congregations. Two meetings for men only were held in the Town Hall, and these were attended by fully 500 men, and were most impressive. Six services were held for boys and girls at 5 p.m., and by means of Bible stories, illustrated with limelight views, the Gospel was preached to the children. On some days as many as 1,500 youngsters crowded into the parish church. Many of these children professed to trust the Saviour.

Park Hall Mission Church, Barking.

Many of your readers are aware that after my return from America in the autumn of 1901, I conducted a special mission here which resulted in my agreeing to stay and preach for twelve months. This time has now nearly expired. I propose—D.V.—to stay on some few months to further consolidate the work, after which I hope to resume my evangelistic labours and Bible teaching, or take up temporary pastorates as the Lord will. It is a matter of deep thankfulness with Mr. Glenny and the diaconate—whose valuable co-operation has been most kind and spontaneous—that in the course of this year ninety souls have been added to the church. Also many others have received blessing at the services and passed on elsewhere. Our hearts are full of praise. Will your readers join us in thanksgiving and pray for a continuation of His good hand upon us? S. Levermore, Pastor.

Broomhill, Northumberland.

Three weeks' special services, held in connection with the Christian Mission, Broomhill, and conducted by Mr. Alexander Clark, of the Evangelization Society, have been a time of great blessing. Like the disciples of old, our hearts burned within us, at the simple, yet powerful, manner in which the evangelist presented the Word of Life. In every address the unconverted were faithfully dealt with. An earnest spirit prevailed; on week nights there were large congregations, and on the Sundays the church was full. Mr. Clark's stay among us has been very blessed indeed. On the last Saturday he gave a highly instructive and interesting lecture on "Prophecy," which was much appreciated. During the mission open-air meetings were held by the church members and Christian Endeavourers. Richard Logan.

Mr. Leonard Weaver at New North Road, N.

A work of grace has been in progress at the Wesleyan Church in New North Road, N., one of the centres of the London Central Mission, where Mr. Leonard Weaver has conducted an evangelistic mission. The building, which seats 2,000 people, has been full on Sundays, while there have been good attendances during the week nights. Some who do not ordinarily attend any place of worship have been persuaded to come through the efforts of a band of young men workers, the fruit of the tent mission held at Islington a year ago. On Sunday week some forty persons, most of them young men and maidens, passed through the inquiry room. Those who were present will not readily forget the sight as one after another came boldly forward. During one of the addresses on "Drink" at the afternoon service, one man (who, it appears, had squandered a large sum of money) rose and stated that he "would have no more of the drink." He signed the pledge. F. C. Pallett.

Mr. R. McLean at St. Helens, Lancs.

A fifteen days' mission, conducted by Mr. R. McLean, Evangelization Society, in connection with the Ragged School Home Mission, has just been concluded. We have to praise God for much blessing. On the three Sunday evenings our large hall has been crowded, and during the week nights the services have been remarkably well attended, considering the conditions of labour in our town. The Thursday evening meetings were particularly good, the audiences including nearly one hundred members of our mothers' meeting, some of whom are among the trophies of the mission. The ingathering has been for the most part among our young men, yet not a few of the members of our Young Women's Bible Class have found their way to the Saviour. Our hearts have been also cheered by a number of the Sunday-school scholars deciding for Christ.

Mr. McLean gave addresses on the "Night Scenes of the Bible," which were much appreciated. Over seventy names and addresses have been handed to the missionary of those who have taken their stand for the Master. W. Finlay Paul, Missionary.

Gipsy Smith at Greenock.

A Gospel mission, which proved full of inspiration and help, has just been brought to a close in Greenock. The evangelist was Gipsy Smith. Prior to his visit meetings for prayer had been held in eight different churches—Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational, under whose auspices the mission was inaugurated and carried through. A spirit of expectancy was awakened in the hearts of the Lord's people, whose burden was, "Wilt Thou not revive us again?"

The town was thoroughly canvassed from house to house, no fewer than 30,000 bills being distributed, and 10,000 cards given to men and women in shipyards and factories. But the results exceeded the most sanguine anticipations, as the congregations on the first Sunday showed. In the morning a large audience assembled in East Congregational Church, where the evangelist preached with great power on "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few." In the evening the Town Hall was densely packed with over 3,000 people, hundreds being turned away from the doors an hour before the time of meeting.

The same experience was repeated the following Sunday, while the hall had never a vacant seat during the week, many requiring to stand throughout. The preacher shows his faith in the old Gospel. Many among the crowds were moved to think of the realities of the world to come. The ultimate issue of such work is not in our hands, but we are glad to report that fully 800 people were dealt with personally in the inquiry rooms. Parents rejoiced to learn of their sons and daughters being "born again," and many who have been anxious for years received the Light of Life. Backsliders were restored, Christians of experience have received blessing, and the prayers of years have been answered. The last address on Sunday evening on "Not Saved" was specially solemnizing, being preceded by the Gipsy's singing of "Over the River." The lecture, entitled "From Gipsy Tent to Platform," was much enjoyed, being, as the preacher said, "A record of grace from beginning to end." Truly the memory of those eight days will live long in the hearts of many, especially of those to whom "Old things have passed away and all things have become new." H. A. S.

At Derby Races.

Our campaign began with a "mass meeting" in the Drill Hall—our largest building—on Tuesday, November 11, to protest against the growing vice of gambling. The great gathering was presided over by the Bishop of Hereford, supported by Colonel Seton Churchill and Rev. James Mursell, of Edinburgh (formerly of Derby). Most of the clergy and ministers of the town were present, and all was admirably organized by the secretary of the Y.M.C.A.

On Wednesday, November 12, we welcomed the Secretary of the Open-Air Mission and a band of five evangelists, veterans in this holy war. The same evening, a united prayer meeting was held in the Y.M.C.A. On the Thursday, Friday and Saturday, the race-course was visited. The police were most courteous; earnest, faithful words were spoken hour after hour, between the races. Hundreds of the poor "tipsters" and "bookies" and their mates listened to the words of life and the Gospel hymns; and tracts were distributed. On Thursday and Friday evenings "open-airs" were held in the Market Place. There was perfect order and rapt attention. Many came forward to receive cards expressing decision for Christ and "Coronation" Gospels (St. John). The Holy Spirit, we are sure, gave much blessing. J. E. M.

At the Dublin Y.M.C.A. there have been cases of decision each week since the winter session opened. Several were Roman Catholics.

Rev. S. H. Kearsey, of India, has just concluded a Temperance Mission in the East Molesey Baptist Chapel. Many pledges have been taken, and juvenile and adult lodges formed. Mr. Kearsey's stories of thrilling experiences in India made a great impression on the people. J. C. Dalrymple, Pastor.

In connection with the London Central Mission, of which Rev. J. E. Wakerley is superintendent, evangelistic services are being held at the Grand Theatre, High Street, Islington, N., every Sunday evening, at 8.15, the doors being opened at 8, as the theatre has been thronged to overflow. There is a full choir, with two bands, and the services are bright and spirited.

An open-air campaign has been conducted at Clapton by Messrs. Pett and Putt, assisted by workers from the various churches of the neighbourhood. The presence of the Spirit of God has been realized, and hundreds of non-church goers have heard the message of God's love. Sinners have sought and found the Saviour, backsliders have been restored, and God's people have been strengthened in their faith. To God be all the praise!

Mr. J. W. Moodie, the soldier evangelist of the London Evangelization Society has concluded a most helpful mission in connection with St. Paul's Presbyterian Church (Rev. W. Ness) Millwall. The church has been well filled on week nights, and on Sundays crowded. Many of the careless and indifferent have been attracted and blessed, and decisions have been made nightly. The Gospel message has been faithfully and powerfully proclaimed, and Mr. Moodie's work will long be remembered.

A united mission has been held at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Naphill, Bucks, conducted by Mr. Albert Richings. The neighbourhood has been awakened, and on the last evening members came forward for "consecration cards" in token of having received personal blessing and to show their determination to serve the Lord. The house visits of the evangelist were a power for good, and helped to bring together large congregations night after night to hear the Word preached.

An eight-days' mission at Croham Road Baptist Church, South Croydon (Pastor Andrew J. Reid), was recently conducted by Mr. Arthur Jennings, assisted by Madame Annie Ryall, who sweetly and effectively rendered the Gospel story in song. The attendance increased night by night, and at the closing service the church was crowded. Very many were deeply impressed, and several were led to decision for Christ. God's people have also been greatly helped and encouraged.

Recently Rev. John Jameson has conducted a mission at Knottingley in the Congregational Church (pastor—Rev. C. E. Everitt). The services for the most part were well attended, and much benefit was derived from the earnest and powerful addresses delivered by Mr. Jameson. The church has been spiritually quickened and built up, and a number of the younger members of the congregation and others decided to serve the Lord Jesus Christ. It was a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

The Free Churches of Ilfracombe have just united in a mission which God has greatly blessed. The ministers of the Congregational, Wesleyan, Baptist, and Bible Christian Methodist Churches conducted afternoon prayer meetings, open-air services, and Gospel meetings in the Alexandra Hall, proclaiming the Gospel with simplicity and plainness, and great blessing followed upon the effort. Crowds came to hear the Word of life, and the whole town was affected. "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." John Stevens, Congregational Pastor.

At Wentwood Waterworks, in connection with the Navvy Mission, a mission has been conducted by Mr. Walter Symes, of Cardiff, and by Mrs. Hamilton, of Pentyrch, who have given some stirring addresses to the men employed on the works during the dinner hour. The speakers met with ready acceptance. Addresses have also been given each evening during the week at which the attendance numbered from fifty to eighty, the great proportion being men. We have felt the power of the Divine spirit in our meetings, and we trust that some of those who have been present may decide for Christ. G. G. Hall, Missioner.

Mr. and Mrs. Porter (78, Brondesbury Villas, Kilburn, N.W.) are open to conduct missions and evangelistic meetings. They have had a wide and varied experience, and their work is well attested by several well-known ministers and others, one of whom writes:—"Mrs. Porter is an untiring worker, both in services and general visitation. Her conversation in the homes of the people is direct and spiritual, and well calculated to secure results, a matter sufficiently attested by the number of conversions during visitation. Her pulpit message has one outstanding feature, and that is its Scripturalness. It has one notable omission, it is entirely free from sensationalism."

Rev. J. Bennett Anderson has just concluded a sixteen days' United Evangelistic and Temperance Mission in Londonderry. The Sunday meetings were held in the Guildhall, and it was a thrilling sight to soe the splendid building packed with about 1,500 people. The week-night gatherings, held in the Mission-hall, were well attended, but best of all the Word was in the power of the Spirit, for as the preacher warned them to flee from the wrath to come, or sought to win them by the love of God, many testified to their desire to live a new life. Mr. Anderson's earnest words on the drink evil were greatly blessed between 200 and 390 persons signing the pledge. The Mission was closed with a helpful lecture on "Round the World for Christ," being the story of his own labours. The "Union" and "Sunbeam" Choirs, under the leadership of Mr. J. H. Dunlop led the praise, and the beautiful singing added greatly to the power and enjoyment of the meetings.

Under the auspices of the Huddersfield Y.M.C.A. (Secretary, Mr. Robert W. Lee), a ten days' mission has been held in the Buxton Road Wesleyan Chapel, Huddersfield, by Rev. Thos. Proudlove of Newcastle-on-Tyne. It commenced with a reception in the Y.M.C.A., when the hall was crowded. The large chapel was filled for the services on the following Sunday, when Mr. Proudlove preached effective sermons. The services during the week were well attended, and every night we had the joy of seeing many go into the inquiry room. The services on the concluding Sunday will long live in the minds of all who were present. The presence of God was powerfully felt. In the afternoon a meeting for men was held, at which many decided for Christ. Meetings for women were also held, as were several services at the mills. The last service was a glorious one, when about thirty souls were led to the Master. The mission was most encouraging; over two hundred stepped "over the line," and decided for Christ, a large number being young men. L.

Requests for Prayer.

For the many distressed poor of London and other great cities.

For a mission at St. Andrews, by Mr. C. Galletly, December 7-21.

For one who has long been looked upon as a Christian, but whose heart is still unchanged.

For a boys' mission, to be held in the city of Dublin Y.M.C.A., from December 9-14.

For meetings being conducted in business houses in the City of London by Dr. Harry Guinness.

For a servant of God who is afflicted with blindness, that his soul may be lit up with God's love and presence, and that he may have perfect acquiescence in God's purpose towards him.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. Albert Walsh, son of Mr. Walter Walsh (the esteemed author of the "Secret History of the Oxford Movement"), has just died in St. Thomas' Hospital, S.W., as the result of terrible injuries received in a cycling accident near Clapham Road Station. Mr. Walsh was only twenty years of age.—At Liverpool, on Sunday week, Mr. James Hakes, whose Christian character and unswerving allegiance to the principles of the Reformation have long been known and valued. His name came before the public most prominently some years ago as the promoter of legal proceedings in the Ritual suit against Rev. Bell Cox—litigation which, it has been stated, cost Mr. Hakes over £3,000. His zeal in the cause of Protestantism remained unabated to the last.—At Norwich, aged seventy-five, Mr. C. W. Alexander. He had been actively identified with Norfolk Congregationalism, and took a leading part in the erection of Cowper Church, East Dereham, and in the work of the county Union.—On November 26, Rev. W. Stone, for a number of years pastor of Vale Baptist Church, Todmorden, suddenly passed away.—Rev. Thos. Blandford, formerly pastor of the Congregational Church, Westgate-on-Sea. Mr. Blandford held his first pastorate at Oakham, whence he removed to Herne Bay about 1855. He was there twenty-five years, during which time through his exertions the new church was built, the former one now being used as the schoolroom. He removed to Westgate in 1882, and there again he was largely instrumental in building the church. He resigned the pastorate in 1890.

Church of England.

The King has approved the creation of a new Bishopric in the Central Provinces in India, to be called the Bishopric of Nagpur. Rev. Eyre Chatterton, B.D., is to be the first Bishop of the new See.

Bishop Tugwell left Liverpool on Saturday last in the Elder, Dempster liner Nigeria for Lagos. It is probable that he will be absent about eighteen months.

The Archbishop of Canterbury attained his eighty-first birthday on Sunday last. In the morning he preached at Canterbury Cathedral in aid of foreign missions, the day having been set apart for intercession in that behalf at the instance of the Archbishop of York.

The Martin Hope Sutton Memorial Hall for the parish of Greyfriars, Reading, was formally opened on Wednesday of last week, the vicar (Rev. S. H. Soole) presiding. Among others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. Charles Stirling (Richmond), and Rev. E. N. Thwaites (Fisherton). The chairman expressed the hope that the same spirit of appreciation which had caused £500 to be sent in within two months, with promises of £250 to enable the building to be opened free of debt, would also make provision for the furnishing, lighting, and upkeep of the hall.

Congregational.

The London Missionary Society has received a gift of £1,000 from an anonymous donor towards the deficiency fund. This reduces the debt to £10,500, which it is hoped will be greatly reduced when the results of the self-denial week are known.

The annual meeting of the Caversham Hill Church, Reading, has been held. Several encouraging reports were given by the leading workers. Nine members have been added to the church during the year, making 122 during the present pastorate. The International Bible Reading Association has nearly 200 members.

Rev. D. Burford Hooke, the secretary of the Colonial Missionary Society, reached London on Saturday last, after an absence of six months in deputation work in the Australian States and New Zealand. Mr. Hooke left England early in June, and first visited Cape Colony, afterwards proceeding to New Zealand and Australia, where he has had conferences with the various Congregational unions in relation to the work of his society.

Baptist.

Pastor and Mrs. Cuff have arrived at Brisbane. They were met by Rev. W. Whalc and other representatives of the Queensland Baptist Association. A public meeting was held in the City Tabernacle to welcome them, when Mr. Cuff gave a stirring speech. Mr. Cuff was to remain in Brisbane for a fortnight, and then hoped to visit the other Australian States and New Zealand, leaving for home in February.

An interesting work has been started at Bleary, a populous country district about four English miles from Lurgan, as the outcome of a mission by Mr. James Hodge, of the Irish Baptist Home Mission. Rev. Fenlon E. Bury, pastor of the Baptist Church, Lurgan, writes:—"A great number have been led to give themselves to the Saviour. We are anxious to put up a wooden hall in the neighbourhood for the purpose of carrying on regular Gospel work there. We are at present using the tent in which the mission was held, but the weather is becoming too cold for it. So great was the work of grace in Bleary that Pastor H. D. Brown, of Dublin, sent down Mr. I. H. McKnight, of the Irish Baptist College, to assist, and he is continuing to carry on the work there. We will require about £80 for the wooden hall."

Methodist.

At the unanimous request of the directors of the Methodist Times, Mr. Percy Bunting, editor of the Contemporary Review, has consented for the present to undertake the editorship of the Methodist Times, rendered vacant by the death of Mr. Price Hughes.

Brunswick Chapel, Leeds, one of the historic chapels of Methodism, has suffered seriously during the past twenty years by constant migrations to the suburbs, but of late it has been full every Sunday evening, and on two or three occasions inconveniently crowded. Young men and women from the shops, artisans from the working-class districts, and well-wishers of Brunswick who visit the city, all join in the crowd that streams to chapel on the Sunday evening, and the congregation is as large as in its palmiest days.

The recently-formed Sheffield Wesleyan Mission held its first anniversary services November 16 and 20. For many years the Ebenezer Chapel, once the prosperous head of a strong circuit, has toiled bravely against adverse conditions, following on rapid changes in the character of the district and its population. A year ago a new page of its history began with its separation from the rest of the circuit, and its renovation for special mission work, under the direction of Rev. John Pickup. The large expenditure in this scheme has been amply justified by the marked prosperity of the work under Mr. Pickup's leadership, followed last Conference by that of Rev. S. Oliver.

Presbyterian.

The sixteenth annual service of praise, in connection with the Association of North London Choirs, has been held in Regent Square Church on Tuesday evening. The musical portion of the service was conducted by Mr. Cook, of Highbury. Rev. Alex. Connell cordially welcomed the choirs in the name of the session and congregation, and in the course of an appropriate address said that it had been at one time customary on such occasions to lecture the choirs on the spiritual requirements of their office. Even still there is sometimes a lurking conviction that choirs have a special gift of irreverence. But he was firmly convinced that it would be a nobler position to assume that those who feel called to devote their services to the Church in this way as conscientious, devout, and responsive to the call of the Gospel as any other servants of our Lord. No choir can render its best service that is denied the sympathy which means so much to Christian worship.

Notes & Comments

Dr. Torrey. This esteemed evangelist, for whose work many are praying, is expected to reach England early in the New Year. His opening mission will be in the Conference Hall at Mildmay Park, beginning in the second week of January, to continue for at least three weeks.

Published this Week. Dr. Alexander Robertson's remarkable book, The Roman Catholic Church in Italy, is published this week. It is emphatically a book for the time; for what Romanism is at home it may become anywhere else. The religious idolatry and political treachery of the system are exhibited with bold fidelity; and we sincerely pray that God will bless the rousing message of the book to weak Protestants and deluded Romanists in our beloved land. (6s. Morgan & Scott.) The same publishers are also issuing, concurrently with the above, Elijah: The Man of Prayer, by Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A. (1s.), in which Christian readers and workers will find much useful material for personal profit and service.

The Reaction in Statesmanship. The passing, by a large majority, of the Education Bill through the Commons, emphasizes the strange wave of reaction that has recently been coming over English politics. The Education Bill of thirty years ago was a great step in the direction of religious liberty and equality. The struggle will now have to be contested practically over again. It will take years of religious and Parliamentary strife, and great strength of principle and purpose, to recover lost ground. There are stubborn forces on either side, and the ultimate victory depends on the single-mindedness and religious devotion of the lovers of liberty.

Religious Teaching in the Board Schools. It is worthy of note that in the annual report issued a few days ago, on the Scripture Knowledge Examination in the London Board Schools, the excellence of the instruction, the attention, and the ability of the scholars are strongly evidenced. It appears that nearly 7,500 papers were sent in by the pupils, and of these 75 per cent. were passed either as good, very good, or excellent, and the head inspector testified to a general improvement. In the light of such statistics and statements, interference with the system seems more than ever uncalled for.

Feeding the Lambs. Lady Lindsay's letter to The Times describing a "mass" at a leading Protestant Church in Plymouth may be commended to the serious attention of those who profess to see in the Education Bill only a fairly honest attempt to meet a national need. Lady Lindsay states that about 300 children, from three to twelve years old, were assembled, with only about twelve adults, and that the service was in every sense a reproduction of the Roman Mass in all its essential teaching, all the early part of the Communion Service being omitted, and the part read (accompanied by much ritual and ceremonial ringing of bells, and incense) being almost inaudible. A clergyman wearing a short Roman surplice, cassock, and biretta, paraded the aisle calling out to the children when to sit, stand, or kneel:—

> The children, however, had been so well drilled that they never failed to bow and cross themselves at the right moment, and at the Incarnatus in the Creed, at the prayer of Consecration, and the elevation of the wafer, they almost disappeared from sight in their efforts to prostrate themselves according to directions received.

At the end of the service, the children, under the direction and surveillance of English clergy, sang "Mother of God! Pray for us sinners now, and at the time of our death."

The Condition of Ecclesiastical Freedom. High Anglicans are becoming more and more restive under State control. Lord Halifax thus placed the aspirations of his party before the E.C.U. at Leicester:—

> Let us have the courage to maintain as true the fact that the Acts of Uniformity are dead and buried. We must organise ourselves under our natural leaders, the Bishops, and not consult any secular authority about it. Why should the Episcopal bench go cap in hand to the Law officers of the Crown and ask for things? . . . Why should Parliament be troubled with the burden of these troublesome ecclesiastical discussions? What we want is a fair field and no favour.

But the only condition on which such freedom could be granted, would be the acceptance of Disestablishment and Disendowment. They will then be as free to govern their own affairs as are Nonconformists and Roman Catholics. But so long as they benefit by alliance with the State, they must submit to the reciprocal control by the State. They cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Roosevelt's War on Trusts. President Roosevelt has proved himself strong enough to dare the wrath of the "Trusts" in his message to Congress, by fearlessly demanding that they should be put under legal supervision. His statement throughout is sane and statesmanlike. Trusts in themselves may be legitimate. It is against insatiate greed that war must be waged in the name of the community. Unjust monopolies, preventing healthy competition, fraudulent over-capitalizations, and other evils, can be prevented by legal restraints; and he ventured to say that if necessary, the very Constitution must be amended in order to be able to deal with this evil effectively. This brave "message," while carrying terror into the camp of evil-doers and unscrupulous monetary adventurers, has greatly rejoiced those who have the interests of the people at heart. During the next two years there will be a fierce fight over these burning questions; and lovers of justice and progress will watch it, hopeful that the President will win.

A Wise Movement. If the London County Council will adopt the resolution moved by Mr. Robert Williams concerning the unemployed, it will perform a work of sterling merit, and add one more to the many good things it has already accomplished. The creation of labour can only be adequately dealt with by a public body. The suggestion is before the Council to seek statutory powers to purchase land, derelict farms, &c., so as to find employment for the "out-of-works," which should prove remunerative alike to the Council and to those employed. It is in every way desirable that men who are willing to work should have opportunities of bread-winning.

The Religious Census. Now that the religious census has commenced in earnest, we only hope it will be thoroughly well carried out. The weather, unfortunately, has been exceptionally inclement; and one minister, whose church is generally overcrowded on Sundays, writes to complain of the figures taken as being in no sense typical of the usual attendance. It is only fair that if, on the day proposed for taking the census, the weather should be exceptionally bad the work should be postponed. Of course it will entail trouble, but as the object of the census is to get at the normal facts, every care should be taken to deal with normal conditions. It will undoubtedly do good for us to know the real facts of the case in all districts of London.

Another Blow to the Gambling Evil. Another victory of an important nature has been won in the Anti-Gambling crusade. The proprietors of The Sportsman were charged by the Anti-Gambling League with inserting in that paper an illegal advertisement of a firm of betting touts. The defence was that the proprietors were not aware of the real character of the advertisement. Fortunately it was decided that its insertion was a punishable offence, and a fine of £10, plus costs, was inflicted. In this, a severe blow has been struck against one of the most insidious evils of the day. There is to be an appeal, but it is to be hoped that the sentence will be upheld by the higher Court. The fine is not great, but the principle established is all-important.

Theatre-Going Readers of Mr. David Williamson's able article in the December number of the Leisure Hour will have no excuse if they do not come to a right decision in regard to the duty, concerning theatre-attendance, of Christians who desire to cultivate spiritual force. The writer's indictment of the modern drama is all the more forcible, because most of the evidence is given by those who are in no way prejudiced against the stage, but who are, as critics, forced to recognise the grave danger to morality of the existing condition of things. Their testimonies are overwhelming, and culminate in that of Mr. William Archer, a dramatic critic of the first rank, who has said:—

> Musical comedy, English and American, does more than ten thousand pulpits can undo, to glorify and enforce the sporting, gambling, bar-haunting, champagne-drinking, flashy, and dissolute ideal of life which dominates that class of production.

The proprietors of theatres and the playwrights are not philanthropists; they produce what pays. The question, therefore, so far as professing Christians are concerned, is simply that of duty versus inclination, and the duty is very clear.

Our Rural Population. In Mr. Rider Haggard's new book on "Rural England" the steady depletion of the country into the towns, with the consequent disastrous effect on the provincial districts, is put with startling emphasis. In 1851 there were 1,253,000 agricultural labourers in England; in 1891 there were 780,700, though in that time the whole population had increased by one-half. The total figures now are put at 25,000,000 town dwellers and 7,500,000 country dwellers. Agricultural labourers are not only few, but they are looked down upon, and their children all endeavour to get as soon as possible into the towns. With no thought of the increased cost of living, the keen competition, the uncertainty of employment, the lack of prospect for the aged, they plunge into the precarious life of the cities, and are quickly lost in the crowd.

The Ennui of Village Life. Yet how can we wonder at such migration in view of the utter social stagnation in isolated districts? The public-house is the only available refuge for the growing youths and men who earn their livelihood in the locality. It is pitiable to see them with nothing but loafing or drinking, or both, wherewith to while away a long, dark evening. Private enterprise does something to mitigate the evil here and there; but there are scores, if not hundreds, of villages absolutely devoid of any means of mental improvement. It is a national question, with which only a Government can deal.

The Decay of the Race. The most disquieting feature of this situation is the decay of the race which results from such depletion of the country. It is well for the cities that the exhausted human stock there packed so thickly should be rejuvenated by fresh country blood, for in two generations there is a serious decline of vital force in town dwellers. But if it be true, as Mr. Haggard says, that "it is now common for only the dullards, the vicious, or the wastrels to stay upon the land, because they are unfitted for any other kind of life," and this indifferent remnant will be the parents of the next generation in rural England, then the racial power of recuperation is being sapped at its fountain-head, and there will be a steady decline of the very class which in past generations has renewed the life of our city populations.

The Spread of Mohammedanism. It is an unhappy fact, borne out by recent census returns, that while Mohammedanism is in a decadent state in Central Africa (the Hausa country), in India and in West Africa the number of Mohammedans has increased by over 8,000 during the last ten years. Doubtless a portion of this addition is due to immigration, and Bishop Tucker has contradicted, so far as the Christians in West Africa are concerned, the statement of the census officer that the increase has been "at the expense of the Pagans and Christians," and has insisted that the "number of lapses from Christianity is exceedingly small." The question, whether West Africa is to become Christian or Mohammedan, is one that every believer in the Divine Saviour should prayerfully consider.

Wealth and Workers.

AN Irish correspondent demurs at the criticism to which wealthy persons are sometimes subjected for spending huge sums upon excessive comfort, luxury, or amusement. It is the old and well-worn argument that all such expenditure involves the employment of labour and the payment of wages, and that if it were not for such lavish outlay, distress throughout the country would be worse than it is.

It is a specious plea, which, like many another, is not difficult to answer. Our correspondent defends the purchase of a dress at £60, or of a tablecloth for £1,400, as recently referred to in our columns. In reply, we may point out that a large proportion of British wealth spent on luxury does not benefit British workers at all, but goes to enrich foreign labour abroad; and that by the supply of articles of excessive worth, it is not the staff of workers but the capitalist who grows rich. Under the present conditions of distress in our midst, the amounts thus expended might certainly be made to "go further," and benefit a larger number, if turned into other channels.

It is a favourite argument that the drink traffic employs a wealth of labour, but statistics prove that in proportion to the capital involved, there is no trade which employs so few workers per £. Similarly, if the £1,400 spent upon a single tablecloth were devoted to the purchase of a number of other and more necessary articles, it would undoubtedly give employment to many more workers.

Nor can we ignore the moral effect upon the individual himself who thus spends abnormal sums upon specific luxuries wherewith to gratify his own conceits, which certainly does not tend to make him a boon or a blessing to the community, nor enlarge his heart to a wider sympathy for the strenuous conditions in which his less favoured neighbours live. Wealth wisely used can accomplish unestimated good; not so that spent recklessly on mere personal desire.

It is a welcome relief to turn from this selfish waste, to the evidences of a higher service rendered to God, on behalf of the poor and needy, by the workers and subscribers who give their time or money to support the various missions and charities of the Metropolis. In our Special Christmas Supplement, contained in the present issue of this paper, we present to our readers some idea of what is being done to lessen distress, and to ameliorate the condition of the multitudes among whom we live.

What a grand array of noble self-denying effort it reveals! An untold number of men and women go forth day by day, year in and year out, to preach the Gospel to sinners, to comfort saints, and to relieve the wants of those who are in need. And their labours are rendered possible only by the generous contributions of those who seek to devote their means to the highest use.

Nor is it only the wealthy who thus bless themselves by blessing others. A study of our weekly Donation List reveals the fact that small donations yield in the aggregate a larger total than that represented by sums of high value. Not a shilling is to be despised; only those who work and live among the poor know how far even a shilling can be made to go!

In placing before our readers, therefore, this annual survey, we earnestly commend these timely and ever-needed efforts—not to Londoners only (for dwellers in every part of our land are indebted to the workers of the Metropolis), but to all whose hearts are touched by the cry of woe, and whose very homes are rendered the more secure by these saving agencies, which do more than perhaps we realize to hold in check the forces of revolution and lawlessness.

To every Christian heart the word of Christ appeals: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto . . . these, ye have done it unto Me." Note also the bold philanthropy of the Apostle James: "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food; and one of you say unto them: Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled—notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body—what doth it profit?" Hear the scathing criticism of John—"Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him—how dwelleth the love of God in him?" "To do good and to communicate, forget not." This is "doing good"—to "help your fallen brother rise"; and "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not—to him it is sin."

*Dealing with Back-Sliders.

By Rev. Dr. R. A. TORREY.

THERE are two classes of back-sliders, and they should be dealt with in different ways.

I. Careless back-sliders; those who have no great desire to come back to the Saviour.—With such persons use Jer. ii. 5, drive the question right home, "What iniquity have you found in the Lord?" Show them the base ingratitude and folly of forsaking such a Saviour and Friend. Very likely they have wandered away because of unkind treatment by professed Christians, but hold them right to the point of how the Lord treated them, and how they are now treating Him. Use also Jer. ii. 13, and show them what they have forsaken, and for what. Have them read the verse, and ask them, "Is that verse true? When you forsook the Lord did you not forsake 'the fountain of living waters' and turn to broken cisterns that can hold no water?" Illustrate the text by showing how foolish it would be to turn from a fountain of pure living water to broken cisterns or muddy pools. God has greatly honoured this verse in bringing back-sliders back to Himself. Use Jer. ii. 19. When they have read it ask them whether they have not found it "an evil thing and bitter" having forsaken the Lord their God. Prov. xiv. 14, 1 Kings xi. 9, and Luke xv. 13-17, can oftentimes be used with effect with an impenitent back-slider, showing him the result of his wandering. We may use Amos iv. 11, 12, oftentimes with good results.

II. Back-sliders who are sick of their wanderings and sin and desire to come back to the Lord.—These are perhaps as easy a class to deal with as we ever find. Jer. iii. 12, 13, and 22, will show them how ready the Lord is to receive them back, and that all He asks of them is that they acknowledge their sin and return to Him. Hos. xiv. 1-4 is full of tender invitation to penitent back-sliders, and also shows the way back to God. Is. xliii. 22, 24, 25, and Is. xliv. 20-22, Jer. xxix. 11-13, Deut. iv. 28-31, 2 Chron. vii. 14, 1 John i. 9, ii. 1-2, set forth God's unfailing love for the back-slider and His willingness to receive him back. Mark xvi. 7, 2 Chron. xv. 4, xxxiii. 1-9, 12, 13, give illustrations of great back-sliders who returned to the Lord and how lovingly He received them, 1 John i. 9, Jer. iii. 12, 13, 2 Chron. xv. 12, 15, vii. 14, show just what steps the back-slider must take to come back to the Lord and be restored to His favour, viz., humble himself, confess his sins, and turn from his sin. Luke xv. 11-24 is, perhaps, the most useful passage of all in dealing with a back-slider who wishes to return, for it has both the steps which the backslider must take and the kind of reception he will receive.

"BE FILLED WITH THE SPIRIT."

ALTHOUGH we received the Holy Ghost when we believed and confessed Jesus as our Lord, it is possible that we may not be filled with the Spirit. Indeed, this is not an act, but a condition of heart or habit of soul. If we are born again, we have received the Spirit once for all. But we are not filled with the Spirit once for all. There is no finality in the life of the new creature, either in this world or the next. Through the ages of the ages we shall go from strength to strength, like the living creatures, the cherubim, going and returning as a flash of lightning, and then standing before the Throne for fresh commands, increasing in wisdom and in the responsibilities committed to us.

The power of the Holy Ghost had come upon the apostles at Pentecost, and they had become Christ's faithful witnesses, bearing His reproach outside the camp. This subjected them to the threatenings of the priests, who took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus, whom they feared and hated. The witnesses prayed God for boldness to speak His Word, and that signs and wonders might be done in the Name of His holy Servant Jesus. The place was shaken, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. This representative fact appears to be mentioned to teach us that Christ's called and Spirit-empowered witnesses need to be daily filled with the same Spirit, even as our bodies need to be sustained by our daily bread (Acts iv.).

Barnabas, "the son of consolation," was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost; Paul had seen the Just One in His risen glory; had yielded himself to be a minister and a witness of the things he had seen, and of those in which his Lord should further appear unto him; and he was baptized and filled with the Holy Ghost (Acts ix. 17; see also xiii. 9). Yet these two good men contended so sharply in the matter of John Mark that they separated the one from the other (Acts xv. 36-39).

Peter, the foremost apostle at and after Pentecost, gave up eating with Gentiles at Antioch, fearing them of the Circumcision; and other Jews, including even Barnabas, were carried away with their dissimulation. Paul withstood Peter to the face, that the truth of the Gospel might continue with those among whom he ministered.

How thankful we must be for the record of these significant incidents, showing us that "the best of men are men at the best"; and, what is of still more importance, that the truth of the Gospel must be kept intact against our characteristic weaknesses, like Peter's impulsiveness and fear of man; and even against our virtues, like Barnabas's yieldingness.

We now ask how is a child of God, having received the Spirit, to become and be kept filled with the Spirit?

First, let it be firmly held that our Gospel proclaims a full, free, perfect, finished, and eternal salvation. "There remaineth no more to be done," on God's part, either for His own glory, the overthrow of the Adversary, the salvation of the sinner, or the completeness of the saint. As the seeking sinner only nourishes his unbelief by asking that something may be added to or taken from the finished work of the Lamb of God, who has borne our sins in His own body on the tree; so neither may the saint throw back on God the responsibility of his being filled with the Spirit. If we are not continuously filled, daily receiving fresh supplies of grace, the cause does not lie with the God of all grace but with ourselves.

In no dogmatic spirit, but with submission to more instructed brethren, I ask attention to the fact that no direction, no encouragement, is given to seek another outpouring of the Spirit after Pentecost, nor is any baptism of the Spirit spoken of after that promised baptism took place.

Jesus, on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, cried, "If any one thirst, let him come unto Me and drink." "This spake He of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive." So that before He had been glorified, and before the Spirit had been outpoured, our Lord Himself declared that the thirst of the human spirit can alone be quenched by drinking from Himself the Spirit who was about to be outpoured (John vii. 37).

In accord with this the Apostle says, "In one Spirit were we all baptized into one body . . . and were all made to drink of one Spirit" (1 Cor. xii. 13).

Every true believer added to the Church since Pentecost has been baptized into the body formed and baptized in the Holy Ghost at Pentecost, and becomes possessed of all its privileges and responsibilities, just as one who becomes a member of any society already formed, accepts and becomes entitled to all the advantages, and subject to all the obligations attaching to its constitution. And having been baptized into the Church which is the body of Christ, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all, he is given to drink of the one Spirit, outpoured at Pentecost, and which flows, as a stream of living water, from the throne of God and the Lamb; and cannot cease to flow so long as Jesus continues to be glorified by the Father and His angel host in heaven, and by a believing people on earth.

Again, the Apostle says, "Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. v. 18). How do men get drunken with wine? By drinking. How are we to be filled with the Spirit? By drinking. By coming unto Jesus, and as members of the Spirit-baptized Church, which is His body, into which we also have been baptized, drinking of the one Spirit, when we have, by faith, come to the risen and glorified Christ.

How, then, are we to drink? As we take our natural food into our system, and as when digested it is assimilated and nourishes our body, so we feed our spiritual nature with the words and thoughts which we take into it. All that we can know of God—of the Father, of the Son, and of the Spirit—is contained in the written Word. We can only drink of the Spirit, and be filled with the Spirit, as we read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, its Divine truths, its exceeding great and precious promises.

As we received Christ at the first, so we must go on receiving Him, appropriating Him, assimilating Him; for "except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you."

We must eat up the little book lying opened on the pierced hand of the Angel of the Covenant (Rev. x.). Like Ezekiel's roll, it is sweet to the taste, but bitter afterwards. And, having eaten, we cannot help but prophesy, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

And this brings us to the important truth, that just as a recruit is a soldier as soon as he receives the King's shilling as an earnest of all that is to follow, so the believer is constituted a witness of Christ, a soldier of the Cross, from the moment he believes; for then he receives the Holy Spirit, as an earnest of the inheritance unto the redemption of God's own possession.

He is not sent as a witness on his own charges, for "I will endow my witnesses, and they shall prophesy, clothed in sackcloth." They are prepared inside the veil for bearing the reproach of Christ outside the camp. For Jesus the Son of God, in whom all the promises of God are Yea, and in Him Amen, promised "Ye shall receive the power of the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you, and ye shall be My witnesses . . . unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

But if we shrink from the place of witness, if we are only soldiers on parade, the fulness of the Spirit, the necessary equipment for the conflict, can neither be given nor received. We may build on the one and only foundation, wood, hay, stubble, and be saved, so as by fire, and all our works burned up; or we may build gold, silver, precious stones, and receive an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ and of God. All depends on our being witnesses of a rejected Christ to a Christ-rejecting world, pulling souls out of the fire, hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. Just as our salvation depends, on the human side, on our own will ("Ye will not come unto Me, that ye may have life. If anyone willeth to do His will he shall know of the doctrine") so the fulness of the Spirit depends on witness-bearing: "Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our mortal flesh." The Curse of Intemperance.

DEAR SIR,—In January last, the 10th, I think, I was waiting at Waterloo Station for a train, and there witnessed one of the saddest sights of my life. It was the day on which the sailor boys return to their ships after the Christmas holidays, and sad to say many of them were the worse for drink. Some were so drunk that they could hardly stand, and were rolling about the platform in all directions, some carrying small bottles of spirits. How the boys reached their train I cannot tell, as mine came along and I had to go.

Surely something could be done to prevent a repetition of such a disgraceful scene. I know of no paper more likely to fall into the hands of workers than THE CHRISTIAN, so I am sending these few lines hoping you will publish them, and that they may be instrumental of some good.

December 2. A MEMBER OF THE B.W.T.A.

Encouragement.

(1 Pet. v. 7.)

Oh! cast thy sins upon the Lord,
Thou weary soul, bow'd down by sin.
The blood of Christ can cleanse thee now,
And re-create thy soul within.
Then taste the joy of pure delight,
As Christ Himself doth give thee light.

Oh! cast thy cares upon the Lord,
Thou weary soul, bow'd down with care.
"He careth" for you, anxious one,
And longs to cheer thy lone despair.
Think only what He bore for thee
In quiet, lone Gethsemane.

Oh! cast thyself upon the Lord,
Thy weary self, and trust His power
To keep thee steadfast to the end,
And faithful in the darkest hour.
On Christ the Rock thou art secure,
And by His cross thou shalt endure.

Oh! cast thy all upon the Lord,
He knows thy sins, thy cares, thy fears,
He knows the longings of thy heart,
And sympathises with thy tears.
Keep trusting; thy reward shall be
The heaven of God's eternity.

Hampstead. (Rev.) W. R. SCOTT.

Mr. Philip Hurditch.—The condition of Mr. Philip Hurditch continues to be the cause of much concern to a wide circle of friends. The chief anxiety is on account of the condition of the heart. An operation performed last Friday was partially successful, and is about to be repeated as we go to press (Tuesday). He and those near him are daily realising the great power of prayer, and will highly value the remembrance before the Throne of their need by the Lord's people.

Reminiscences of Dr. Parker.

By Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

MY first remembrance of Dr. Parker goes back to the time when he was minister of Cavendish Chapel, Manchester. He had been preaching one of the famous Heckmondwike Lectures, and Mr. Bowman, himself a minister of great ability, described Dr. Parker's style as being like a drop of water, which swells and flows into a river, a good illustration of the marvellous suggestiveness of his short, terse sentences. Rev. David Loxton, of Sheffield, thought that it was well-deserved praise, and that the young minister, whom so many persons were abusing, was a man of extraordinary gifts. The next I heard was of his standing up for a student in Cavendish College (a college of his founding, and now known as Nottingham Congregational Institute), against whom serious charges were made; it was a case of his generosity of heart misleading his judgment. Next I had the satisfaction of hearing him give one of his anti-State-Church Lectures, when he had with him his young bride, who afterwards shared his joys and sorrows, and added no small charm to his life. The radiance of her youth never faded from her face, and her death, two years ago, was the blow that shattered his strength. That anti-State-Church crusade was, I believe,

ONE OF THE FAILURES OF HIS LIFE.

His hold upon many kinds of minds was strikingly shown by the delight felt in his speaking by such a man as the late Dr. Eustace Conder, himself as "safe" and "proper" and undramatic as any one could be. "Did you hear Parker last night?" he said to me, as he and I rode together in a cab to a service. "No," I said. "Well," he said, "I stayed in town to hear him. I sat next him on the platform, and told him he must speak well, as I was present on purpose to hear him. His speech was a miracle of conciseness." Perhaps no Englishman of his day could so well afford to be reported in the very words which he spoke. He did not revise his printed sermons; there was no need.

One of the most helpful services I ever attended was on a Thursday morning, when he preached from Matt. ii. 13, and laid special stress upon the words, "Be thou there until I bring thee word." Trust in God was enjoined with much persuasiveness, and at the close of the service a lady sang with simple pathos the hymn, "Simply trusting every day," the congregation joining in the chorus. That was congregational worship.

Nearly twenty years ago I started a mission in Aldershot for the benefit of women and girls, and have had a cottage home for them all that time. When my friend, the late Dr. Hannay, heard of it, he asked if he "might have the privilege of helping me with a subscription." I replied, "Certainly." When he died, I asked Dr. Parker if he would kindly take his place, and he at once consented, and never missed paying his subscription save the year of Mrs. Parker's death; I did not like to trouble him. Next year he gave me, unasked, a double sum.

A brother minister once told in my hearing how he had been quite beaten with the case of a young man who had come to him for religious instruction, until it occurred to him to advise him to go to the City Temple. There he found what he needed.

Dr. Parker's dramatic instinct was irrepressible. After a meeting in the City Temple, which was addressed by a well-known journalist, I found myself in the vestry alone with the Doctor and Mrs. Parker, when, to her amusement and mine, he gave us some of the journalist's speech over again—tone and manner to the life.

I think he used to feel very keenly the loneliness of the pulpit—it is a lonely place. I was with him in the pulpit of Tottenham Court Road Tabernacle when he preached the opening sermon, and when he finished he motioned to me to come and sit next to him. I am sure he longed for fellowship, and was comforted when I said how I had been touched by some of his closing words: "You will never repent of having been over-generous, over-kind, over-forgiving." "No," he said, "we never regret these things."

"Come up and have lunch with me," he said, the last time I saw him in his vestry. I went, and had a brotherly reception. One thing only will I repeat, as it marks the man in two respects—his physical soundness and his quickness of reply. "Do you ever use glasses, Doctor?" I inquired, "for I cannot remember ever seeing you with them." "No," said he, "I used to thread my wife's needles for her. When she got out her spectacles, and was poking about, I used to say, 'Here give me that.'" Then he went through the pantomime of threading the needle, and handing it back to his wife (alas! she was no longer with him). "No," he added, "I have no vices. I don't smoke, I don't drink, and I never use glasses!" One day I inquired at a street paper-stall for a copy of a paper which contained a portrait of Dr. Parker, the young woman who served being a typical Londoner of the small trading class. "What a speaking likeness that is of him," she remarked, as she admiringly looked at the picture, and then passed the paper on to me. One of his hearers, no doubt.

How many persons prayed for him whom he did not know! One of the devoutest of Congregational ministers, whom he never knew, heard him in the Poultry Chapel when things were not over bright, and ever afterwards remembered him in prayer. Prominent men owe much to private intercessors, and both will enjoy the reward together.

Now that the commanding presence is gone, London, the whole Church, seems strangely empty. Yet the living Lord remains.

Love Thyself Last.

AWAY in a little country town, a Christian Endeavour convention was being held. The hall was very full—full, indeed, to overflowing. Among the audience were two young girls—cousins. One was fair, with a sweet and placid face; the other dark, with a restless and almost excited expression. The fair maiden was a Christian Endeavourer, but her cousin was not. It was the first convention she had ever attended. As a rule she was not particularly attracted by speech-making. "If we would only do more and say less!" was a favourite maxim of hers. Well, the first hymn was over, and there was a general settling down for the speeches. The first two speakers had strong voices and vigorous manners; it was as if a rushing mighty wind were filling the place. They were applauded very warmly, and Jessie, the fair, got quite excited and rosy with enthusiasm. Barbara, on the other hand, listened quietly and almost indifferently.

The last speaker got up—a little man, dark, clean shaven, and quiet in manner. He took for his leading thought the sneer cast upon Jesus: "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." In a few brief, quiet, forceful words he put before his hearers what a grand compliment to Jesus Christ that so-called sneer really was. "He could have saved Himself, but He would not; He lived and died simply to save others. What if His disciples had said to their Master, 'Master, save Thyself'—what would His answer have been? 'I cannot.' No, He could not think of Himself, He could not live for Himself. He could not, because He would not."

As the address was drawing to a close, a hush fell upon the meeting; no one felt inclined to applaud. Barbara's usually restless eyes were fixed upon the speaker, her fingers were locked tightly together, her soul was drinking the message in. And when the voice of the speaker had ceased, she sat in the same attitude till she became aware that her cousin's eyes were regarding her with earnest scrutiny. She turned quickly for a hymn-book, and when her cousin looked at her again, it was the old Barbara that she saw.

After the meeting there were refreshments for those who had come a long way. Barbara, her aunt, and cousin, stayed with a few others. "Did you like the meeting, dear?" asked Barbara's aunt. "Oh, yes, thank you, aunt," was the half careless reply, and Barbara's aunt turned away with a sigh. "If only Barbara were more open," she thought a little sadly. She was very fond of this niece of hers, but had been repulsed when she had tried to get at the secrets of the young soul. Barbara's manner for the rest of the evening had a decidedly defiant air, which was generally the case after she had been deeply touched. Two days after the meeting she left for her home in London.

In a tastefully furnished room of a large house in a handsome thoroughfare, Barbara was sitting. She had come in answer to an advertisement in the paper for a companion-secretary to a lady. She was pretty sure of success in her application, as she was a good writer, a capital companion, had excellent references, and was fortunate enough to be the second one to get there. In a minute there was a knock at the front door, and then another young girl was shown into the room where Barbara was. She was dressed in black, her face pale and thin; she looked tired, too. Barbara found out that she was supporting her mother, and had just left a trying engagement as governess to two little boys. "I should like to get this," she said, wistfully. Barbara was silent. There was a flush on her face. It would be her turn to go in next. But the thought had come like a flash, "He saved others; Himself He could not save." She wanted the engagement badly. Should she let this other one go first? After all perhaps she would not get it, and then it would be her turn. The door opened. "Next, please." Barbara turned, and whispered quickly, "You go next; I don't want it so much." With one swift, grateful, backward glance the stranger went. She was in the next room a long time. Meanwhile, a dozen other applicants had arrived, and sat patiently and pathetically waiting. Then at last the other door in the room opened, and the stranger came out. She glanced from face to face till she saw Barbara: nodded a smiling "Thank you," though her eyes were full of tears. Barbara smiled too, and then turned to the stately lady who had followed the stranger out. This lady looked round her, then said: "I need not trouble any of you, as I have engaged the young lady who has just left." The little crowd dispersed. "It's like school," remarked Barbara, laughing, as she went down the steps. But as she was walking home she was asking herself: "Have I done foolishly?" What do you think, reader? What do you suppose God thought? M. S.

"Yet will I Trust Him."

"THERE are songs which can only be learned in the valley," says George Matheson, the blind clergyman, in his poetical language; and again he says, "Despise not thy school of sorrow, O my soul! It will give thee a unique part in the universal song."

One who is being educated for that choir invisible, to sing the strain of redemption, is Miss H. R. Higgins, in Melbourne. She was led to Christ by her Sunday-school teacher. Already there began to work in her physical frame the strange disease which, as it developed, necessitated the amputation, first of her right arm under the elbow, then successively of the left leg and the left arm, and finally of the right arm above the elbow. In the body thus crippled, and eaten up by terrible pain, a redeemed soul triumphs rejoicing.

Complying with the requests of friends, the sufferer penned an autobiographical sketch by means of a writing instrument applied to her elbow. The simple touching story, YET WILL I TRUST HIM, is dedicated to God's suffering children, and published by the Religious Tract Society (1s. 6d.). A gentleman in Melbourne who knows the writer desires to make her remarkable testimony more widely known. Through his kindness a limited number of copies are given free to ministers, doctors, or nurses. Apply to Mr. William R. Dovey, 26, Crouch Hall Road, N.

The Evangelical Alliance.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE AT FOLKESTONE.

[BY OUR OWN COMMISSIONER.]

LAST week the Evangelical Alliance held its fifty-sixth annual conference, extending over three days, at the Town Hall, Folkestone. At the opening meeting General Sir WILLIAM STIRLING, K.C.B., who presided, expressed the peculiar pleasure which the council of the Alliance experienced in calling together for prayer and conference all believers in the Lord Jesus, on the one common basis of our union in Him.

The principles on which the Alliance is based are those on which all Protestant Christians can unite. Its purpose is to manifest the unity of all believers, to witness for the faith of the Gospel, to girdle the world with prayer, and to relieve persecuted Christians in all lands. The spirit which underlies all the work and operations of the association is expressed in the words, "Grace be with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth," and "We are one body in Christ."

A very profitable address was given by Rev. D. STATHER HUNT, of Tunbridge Wells, who said he would rather give a message than make a speech. For there is all the difference between a speaker and a messenger, and from his view-point it was far better to be a humble messenger for Christ than to be the most brilliant speaker that ever lived. If we have a message from Christ, no matter how feeble the language, we may be sure it will touch hearts and accomplish all God's good pleasure in the hearers. We have no need to invent new messages for the people, nor is there any need for garments borrowed from Aaron's wardrobe. All we need is the truth as it is in Jesus—the living Christ Himself. Proceeding, he referred to four passages from the Epistle to the Philippians which reveal Christ as (1) All-subduing (iii. 21); (2) All-strengthening (iv. 13); (3) All-satisfying (iv. 18); (4) and All-sufficient (iv. 19). One could only thank God for such a sturdy and staunch adherent to the truth, a good soldier who is doing valiantly in the Lord's battle.

THE PRAYER OF FAITH.

At the prayer-meeting on Wednesday morning Mr. W. B. SLOAN, secretary of the China Inland Mission, gave an informing and illuminating Bible-reading on "The Prayer of Faith." Speaking from the incident of the disciples passing the fig-tree, and seeing that it was withered away in response to the words of the Lord Jesus, he pointed out how the Lord went on to use this as an illustration of God's constant working in response to the prayer of faith. But we are not to understand that our Lord means that we can cast mountains into the sea. To the eye of Christ mountains here represent the difficulties which stand in the path of the child of God, who is moving in the line of God's will. Never once did our Lord take a mountain and put it into the sea. But constantly He came face to face with difficulties which needed more power to remove than the putting away of a literal mountain.

"Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Thus it is all in believing; and if we would only believe, we should get what we ask. But it is an axiom of the prayer-life, that we must know God in order to believe Him. We must know Him as Father; for it lies at the very root of all confidence in prayer to see that our Father really knows what things we have need of before we ask. It remains for ever true that if we ask we shall receive, but let it ever be remembered that our Father will make no provision for the fulfilment of the desires of the flesh, no matter though they be expressed.

It is when we remember the conditions of answered prayer, and get into right relationship to Himself, that God puts Himself, so to speak, into our hands, and commits all His power and blessing into the power of our faith. But in these days there is nothing that it is more difficult to make time for than for the ministry of prayer; yet after all prayer is the one thing that must be done, and if necessary all the other things of life must be put on one side that we may give ourselves to the ministry of prayer.

Mr. JOHN WOOD, of the Evangelization Society, presided at the morning session, when the subject for consideration was "The Word Written and the Word Incarnate." Mr. Wood, in introducing the subject, spoke of Paul (1) stripped, Phil. iii. 7; (2) clothed, Phil. iii. 9; (3) educated, Phil. iii. 10; and as (4) an athlete, Phil. iii. 14; (5) a man of tears, Phil. iii. 18, 19; (6) a man gazing up, Phil. iii. 20; and (7) as a man triumphant, Phil. iii. 21.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF UNBELIEF.

Rev. TREVOR FIELDER (St. Stephen's, Walthamstow) remarked that many modern writers of religious books do not come into God's presence with their shoes off but with hob-nailed boots on. There are some lives of Christ which plainly reveal the fact that the writers have not fully studied the four inspired records of the Saviour. How dare they separate the written Word from the Word Incarnate? And after all, the difficulties of unbelief are infinitely greater than any difficulties associated with faith. The miraculous element in the Bible may be hard to understand, but surely the Creator of the Universe has the power to suspend the laws of His own devising. Nor is miracle any difficulty to the humble believing heart, for the turning of the soul from sin to God is the greatest miracle after all.

More and more we have ethical teaching which does meet the deepest need of the human heart, for though it may be very beautiful, it is like a fine steeple with no foundation. The Word written and the Word Incarnate stand or fall together; and what God has joined together let no man put asunder.

Rev. G. A. SOWTER, M.A. (Hatcham), who followed, remarked that we were meeting together to emphasize the Divine side of the human Word, the Divine side of the Lord Jesus Christ. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God." Thus run the opening words of the simplest chapter in the Bible, as far as the small words which it contains are concerned; and yet there are depths in that chapter into which we gaze with inexpressible awe.

What wonderful things words are! Wherever man is found, speech is found—sometimes in very limited vocabulary, but sufficient for the purpose of life; and sometimes, as in Oriental countries, where it is the work of a lifetime to learn the language. It is this power of speech which makes man a social being, and lifts him above all other life. If we were dumb we might know each other by the faculty of touch or by the faculty of sight; but this would be very imperfect. It is by our words that our characters are known to each other, and out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Thus the mouth is the revealer of character, and thus the Incarnate Word is the Revealer of the Father. Apart from Christ, we might have known something of God; but to the Christian, Christ is the word and revelation and final expression of the heart and fulness of God.

THE WARP AND WOOF OF REVELATION.

In the afternoon Sir ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B., dealt with "The Deity of Christ," which he declared to be in the very warp and woof of our Christian revelation from beginning to end. There are many words in the New Testament which admit of no other meaning, and many other words which imply it—words spoken by Christ Himself. Now these are all words which no ordinary man would dare utter concerning himself, and at the same time preserve any reputation for sanity. Some of Sir Robert's personal friends in the last twenty-five years had held republican views, but as soon as they got into personal contact with the late Queen, they became strong supporters of the monarchy. So it always is with the man who is brought to trust Christ; he becomes at once a loyal servant of his Sovereign Lord—his God and Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Rev. G. A. SOWTER said we know that Christ is God, because He keeps His word. Men and women as witnesses to-day boldly affirm that they came weary and sad to Jesus, and He has given them rest. They have turned from the unsatisfactory sources of joy to the Lord Jesus Himself, who is the true source of eternal joy, a well of water springing up unto everlasting life. And now living in trustful obedience to His will, the Lord Jesus Christ is indeed held and confessed as the Son of God.

"More and more," said Rev. S. A. MCCRACKEN, "we are constrained by this doctrine to a spirit of worship rather than to the act of preaching. It is a Divine subject, and we have no words which can really express the Divinity of Christ. It is useless to expect the infidel to understand His Deity. He must be born again, and the new life will place him in an attitude before God, in which alone he is able to grasp the fulness and grace of the Godhead of Jesus.

OUR PROPITIATION.

In spite of the severe cold, the Hall was well filled in the evening, when Sir ROBERT ANDERSON, Mr. W. B. SLOAN, and Pastor CHARLES SPURGEON spoke on "The Lord Jesus Christ—our Propitiation." Sir ROBERT ANDERSON described redemption as the work of atonement, reconciliation as the effect of atonement—a work Christ still carries on—and propitiation as not a work at all, but the Lord Himself. Christ is our propitiation. And while the Epistle to the Romans is emphatically the Redemption book, the Epistle to the Hebrews is just as emphatically the Propitiation book. It still needs to be affirmed again and again that light is the only place where we can have fellowship with God and fellowship one with another. Our place is in the camp under the Shekinah light; to go out into the darkness of the night is to lose fellowship with God and with our brethren. Under the light we see the blood on the mercy seat, and if we walk in the light we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin.

Mr. W. B. SLOAN thought that many who call themselves Christians need to be recalled to a life lived in the light that streams from Calvary. Paul lived there. What does he say about it? "I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me."

The only thing that has ever made any impression on the heart of a sinful man is God in Christ, making propitiation for sin. It is when we see the Cross that we know our own sinfulness—sin appears sin then. For the only thing that brings sin to light is the sacrifice of Calvary. In these days there is a preaching of Christ's love that is utterly powerless and fallacious, because it is not put in connection with the fact of our sin and peril.

After prayer, Pastor CHARLES SPURGEON gave a telling and powerful address on the prayer of the publican, appealing to the unsaved to decide for Christ there and then.

NOT PENALTY, BUT PARDON.

At the morning session, on Thursday, Rev. J. B. FIGGIS, M.A., said he was once at a meeting in Lambeth Palace where the late Dr. Westcott said the difficulty was not about eternal punishment, but about eternal forgiveness; not penalty, but pardon. For how can a guilty man be justified with God? Justification is more than pardon. The sinner is not only treated as a forgiven sinner, but as though he never had sinned. Hence, to be justified is to be accounted righteous before God. Now, therefore, there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus. No spot, no speck, no stain left upon us, because we are justified, and justified completely, for, by Him, all that believe are justified from all things.

The doctrine that we are justified by blood is no new doctrine, for it is as old as Abel, and Isaac, and Abraham; for they all offered sacrifices according to the word, "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." It was revealed unto the people in those ancient times, and by ancient types, that men are justified by blood. But the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sin; they were utterly ineffectual to cleanse the conscience and give the sinner a clean heart.

Pastor W. Fuller Gooch said it is not possible to deserve justification, for we have no deserts to show. By our own deservings we can never get out from under the penalty of sin. I am ill-deserving to start with, I am ill-deserving to go on with, and I cannot pay my debt by promising to do well in the future. No deserving justification, no purchasing it, no earning it, but His righteousness and blood, are the sinner's only plea. Justification is as complete as soon as a man has believed on Jesus as it is after fifty years of Christian living. Faith gives us a perfectly clean bill. We start with all our old sins gone for ever, and for ever we are to be accepted in Christ.

Rev. W. R. Mowll, M.A., referred to the extraordinary amount of ignorance found even in Christians as to what justification really means. To him ministers are verily guilty in not dealing more with topics bearing on the great foundation truths, and in using terms like faith, justification, and many others without explaining their meaning. Preachers must not take too much for granted. Nor should they allow themselves or others to confound sanctification with justification. Many do this, and that is why some excellent people have such loose ideas of true holiness.

Finally, Rev. S. A. McCracken brought the last message to the Conference in the words of Ephesians iv. 3; "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." We cannot make unity, we can only maintain it; and this can only be done by the proper recognition of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Looking over a vessel one day, he came across the words on a cabin door, "Certified for the Accommodation of the Master." This, he said, should be written over every heart and every life. Then it will be easy to live the life of love, for the love of God will abound in our hearts.

The Bible League.

A CONFERENCE was held last week at West Norwood, under the united auspices of the congregations worshipping at Lansdowne Hall and Chatsworth Road Baptist Chapel. Rev. J. B. Barraclough addressed the opening meeting for prayer, and Dr. A. T. Pierson and Pastor A. G. Brown spoke to a large gathering in the afternoon. In the evening a meeting was held at the latter chapel, when Mr. R. C. Morgan presided, and Mr. Henry Varley read the Scriptures and led in prayer. The addresses given by Sir Robert Anderson and Pastor W. Fuller Gooch were characterized by deep spirituality and earnest protest against the erroneous and dangerous teaching of the Higher Criticism, emphasizing the necessity for increased effort in advocacy of the complete inspiration and infallibility of the Bible as the Word of God.

A minister of the Reformed Church of England, in a letter received by the Bible League, says, "Some ten years ago I was on the down grade upon the question of Biblical infallibility, but seeing where such a course must logically land me, I looked round in real anguish to find a way of escape, if it were possible, to get on the old foundation once again. I met with Dr. Pierson's 'Many Infallible Proofs,'* and it was blessed to me, and was the Divine means of 'restoring my soul.' Now for some years I have been able logically, and I trust spiritually, to rest upon 'the Word of the Lord,' knowing by bitter experience the terrible effects of the Higher Criticism, and I rejoice that such a Society as yours exists. The subsequent study of the Word in the original languages has given a new life and fire to my ministry, and has been blessed to the 'resting' of the faith of many in the Blessed Book."

To Cheer the Soldiers in Hospital.—Mr. Charles Coupland, A.S.R., Rock Villa, 46, Sistona Road, Balham, S.W., is visiting London Military Hospitals, and writes that he will be grateful for new Christmas cards, writing paper, and envelopes, and small articles suitable for presents for the invalided soldiers; also Gospels, Testaments, and magazines for distribution in barracks.

Salvation Army.

WOMEN'S SOCIAL WORK.

THE close of the eighteenth year of the Women's Social Work of the Salvation Army was marked by a large and enthusiastic Thanksgiving meeting in Holborn Town Hall. Many friends met Mrs. Bramwell Booth at a reception held previously in the Minor Hall; and advantage was also taken of this opportunity to make an attractive display of needlework and other evidences of the useful lives which the women are expected and taught to live in the Homes.

Lord Kinnaird, who took the chair, congratulated Mrs. Booth on what has been accomplished; yet, as one who had long been engaged in rescue work, he declared that we are just touching the fringe of the problem, or realising that there is a problem.

While there had been ups and downs in the history of the work, Mrs. Bramwell Booth acknowledged with gratitude that the past twelve months had been a good year. Reminding her audience that the social work was only one branch of the Salvation Army, that she spoke for that among women alone, and that again in but one country, she reported that during the year 2,188 cases have passed through the Rescue Homes. Of these 1,856 proved to be satisfactory, 1,003 being sent to situations as domestic servants, 558 returned to friends, 73 introduced to work or business of different kinds; five had died, and two had married.

AFTER-CARE AND SUCCESSFUL CASES.

In connection with the after care of those who had previously been dealt with, it was reported with satisfaction that 621 who were doing well had come to stay for a few days in intervals of changing from one situation to another, most of them paying their way. In the midnight work the officers had spent 6,186 hours on the streets of London; while no fewer than 1,900 voluntary visits had been paid by the women themselves to the homes of the officers. At the Shelters and Metropoles for the most miserable, despairing, and actually homeless, 2,168 persons had been uplifted to a better and happier state of things, and helped to earn their own living.

The proportion of successful cases in the rescue work was reported to be larger than ever before; and in the development there is constantly before them the great need for more Homes. Better as well as more work could be done if the means were available for more careful classification. Yet a wider field is opened up by the receipt of constant requests from other countries for qualified officers.

To carry on the twenty-five Homes and twenty-two other institutions, Mrs. Booth received during the year about £10,000; and she claimed that a good return had been made for the money. Among the benefits which had been the outcome of the labour put forth, she called attention (1) to the service rendered to the classes as distinguished from the masses—prodigal daughters, sisters, and wives coming to them from luxurious homes, and bearing honoured names. (2) Much had been done by taking the waste lives around and training them for usefulness as domestic servants.

(3) The rates had been saved, because the majority of the persons dealt with were paupers, criminals, inebriates, or were in imminent danger of becoming so. The cost of maintaining women who would otherwise be in workhouses was £6 as against £26. Inebriates were maintained for £25, similar cases in the county institutions costing £80. On criminal women £12 was spent, as compared with £30; and not many are reformed in prison, while fully sixty-five per cent. of their prison inmates do not go back to dishonest courses. (4) All the churches are served, for the women represent families belonging to every communion; and in many cases go back to their old connections when they have been brought back from the wilderness of foulness, and vice, and degradation. (5) The value of the personal service to the friendless and homeless women cannot be estimated. (6) The gain to the families concerned was also of the highest importance; and (7) it had been a joy to the workers to make a donation of themselves, and they also had been great gainers.

As one who had been present at the opening of the first small Home, Mr. T. A. Denny testified to the gratitude with which he had seen the little one becoming a thousand; and expressed the opinion that, from a citizen's point of view, it is an economical thing to support Mrs. Booth. From his experience of prison parochial, and municipal life, Sir Algernon West had also seen enormous benefits accrue Although it could not be tabulated, Mr. R. C. Morgan attached great importance to what had been accomplished in the way of prevention. Among others who took part in the proceedings were the Mayors of Shoreditch, Hackney, and Southwark; Mr. J. D. Hope, M.P.; and Rev. Barclay F. Buxton (C.M.S., Japan).

The Kensit Crusade.

SELDOM has a more enthusiastic demonstration taken place in Exeter Hall than that held on the 2nd inst., at which Mr. J. A. Kensit was publicly welcomed on taking up the work of his esteemed father.

The chairman, Alderman Inskip, said that they had met, full of hope, to inaugurate an important advance in Protestant work. "We strive not for small points, but for great principles; and how shall right principles be inculcated except preachers go forth to declare them? The statement made by Sacerdotalists that Protestants love controversy for the sake of personal gratification is untrue; on the contrary, those who maintain Protestant truth have had to suffer for their courage. Priestcraft is making fresh inroads, and under these circumstances we bid God-speed, with greater warmth, to Mr. J. A. Kensit and his preachers.

The heartiest of receptions was accorded to Mr. J. A. Kensit, who followed with an earnest address. Rome never changes, and the system which hurled the weapon against John Kensit is the system which has deluged the nations with blood. They were not gathered, however, in mournfulness, for "death is swallowed up in victory." Duty belongs to us, results to God, and "when man is most ready to perish, God is most ready to save."

A CALL TO THE NATION.

We hear the cry of the children: "Save us from those who would rob us of the Word of God; who declare ignorance to be the mother of reverence." We hear the voice of Europe: "Away with the Jesuits, the foes of liberty." We hear the moan of our sisters within convent walls: "Let in the light of day, that we may have the liberty of the children of God." We hear the cry of the electorate: "No priests in our schools, no idolatry in our churches." We hear, too, the murmur of thousands in the land driven to say farewell to the church of their fathers; but we hear, too, behind all, the voice of God: "I have marvellously delivered thee." Surely these voices shall be sufficient to call the nation to the defence of its liberties and of the Truth of God. The dark villages, the priest-ridden towns, and the unconverted masses everywhere must have the light, and to this end it is hoped to extend the operations of the Wickcliffe preachers, and to found a training-home.

Quoting Nehemiah vii. 2, "He was a faithful man, and feared God greatly," Rev. C. Musgrave Brown spoke of the faithfulness of the late Mr. Kensit, and made a vigorous appeal on behalf of the crusade.

The concluding address, from Mr. Henry Varley, was an impassioned description of the machinations of Rome in modern Europe, setting nation against nation, in contending for the temporal power, and upholding the blasphemous dogma of Papal infallibility. Mr. Varley adduced a great body of evidence to show that Rome is still, as ever, the cruel foe of liberty. And to-day, as in times past, the ambition of Rome is to bring the nations again under the despotic sway of the Pope, and "to subjugate and break the will of an imperial race." It is the Papal war against civil and religious freedom. Mr. Varley concluded with an earnest appeal for Mr. Kensit and the Wickliffe preachers in their valuable work.

The Successful Minister.

By Rev. T. L. CUYLER, D.D.

THE highest aim and ambition of every true minister of Jesus Christ is to achieve spiritual success. For this he prays and for this he labours; and for the lack of this neither fame, nor popular favour, nor large salary can be any compensation. He is not blind to the fact that in his success two factors must be reckoned with—the human and the Divine. The planting of the wisest Paul, and the watering by the most eloquent apostles, will avail nothing unless God gives the increase. Not by human might nor power, but by the agency of the Holy Spirit, is success to be secured. The minister may pray ever so fervently for the blessing of the Divine Spirit, but he cannot dictate and demand that blessing.

Yet there are certain things that the ambassador of Jesus Christ must be, and must do, if his ministry is to bear spiritual fruits. For doing his duty he is responsible; for spiritual results he rolls the responsibility over upon the Master he serves. He works, but he does not worry.

LOVE FOR WORK AND MASTER.

1. The first essential to success is that a minister should not only love his work, but love that Divine Master and Owner whose blood-redeemed servant he is. Paul cut at the root and the core of the matter when he said, "The love of Christ constraineth us." Not only His love for us, but ours for Him.

A vast deal of preaching and teaching has self—in some shape—at the bottom of it, and Christ is not there at all. "Whose I am and whom I serve." The more entirely a minister can fulfil this vital and indispensable condition the stronger he will be, the happier he will be; yes, and the holier he will be also.

As surely as the heart-thermometer shows a lowering of the Christ-love, so surely will the sermons and the prayers feel the chilling effect; and a cold pulpit sends its frost through the whole congregation. On the other hand, when a minister brings Jesus Christ with him into the pulpit, then there is a "tongue of fire" there which will burn its way into the hearts and consciences of the auditors. Genius, scholarship, rhetoric, are but "tinkling cymbals" in comparison with this indwelling, o'er-mastering grace of personal love for a personal Saviour. If such men as Brainerd, McCheyne, Somerville, Spurgeon, or Moody were sitting by my side, they would say "Amen!" to every word I have just written. "More love to Thee, O Christ!" is the prayer that should be oftenest on every minister's lips.

REACHING THE HEART.

2. As the spiritually successful minister is a man whose highest inspiration is a supreme love of Christ, so it is his foremost aim to induce his hearers to give their hearts to Jesus. He knows no other way to save a life but to save the heart that animates and controls that life; and the only way to save that heart is to enthrone Jesus Christ there. Winning people to trust, to obey, to follow Christ—that is his "high calling."

There is a constantly pressing temptation with ministers to ignore this, or to substitute something else for it. One minister who lives much in an atmosphere of books is tempted to preach chiefly to the intellect, and gives much valuable instruction. Another is deeply interested in sociology, and aims to reform social wrongs, to promote humanitarian enterprises and Christian citizenship.

Christ's Gospel goes infinitely deeper than mental instruction or social reforms, or excellent philanthropies of various kinds. It aims to change human hearts and to put Jesus Christ there. His message was, "Come unto me," "Follow me;" and no minister ought to feel that his work is successful unless (by the Holy Spirit's aid) he can win people to the service of Christ. His vital purpose is to form character—to make bad people good, and good people better; this means heart-work; this means regeneration; this means salvation for this world and another. My brother, do you fail right there? Then there must be something wrong in your aims or your methods, or your spirit; for the Christian ministry that yields no fruits of Christian lives is about equivalent to medical practice that heals no sick folk; or a legal practice that wins no verdicts. To search honestly for the causes of failure is often the first step to success.

THE DIVINE COMMISSION.

3. The minister who intensely loves his Master, and with singleness of heart labours for the salvation of his fellow-men, works at an immense advantage. He is not obliged to manufacture his weapons, or invent his arguments, or construct his own motive power. "Preach My Word!" is his Divine commission; "Lo! I am with you alway" is his promise of divine support. My observation has been that those ministers who have had the most spiritual success (for that is the point I am discussing) have been men who had an implicit faith in the supernatural inspiration and the Divine authority of their Bible, and who have kept at the front the great central themes of revelation. They have wasted no time or breath in defending God's Book, which they hold to be self-evidencing; they have planted themselves on the adamant of God's unshakable truth, and preached with the light of eternity flashing in the faces of their auditors.

They have not frittered away their sermons on secondary topics, or blinked human depravity, or concealed hell, or beclouded the Atonement, or dwarfed God's infinite love, His Christ's infinite claims, or the indispensable need of the Holy Spirit at every step. They have aimed to make sin horrible, and Christ lovable, and a life of fruitful service the only life worth living. Such preaching the promise-keeping God has stamped with success, and will do it while the world stands. Try it and see.

THE PASTORAL VISIT.

4. One day in seven is not enough for such a minister. He proclaims boldly, yet lovingly, God's glorious message from his pulpit, and then follows it up through the week. A sermon that will not bear to be followed up is not worth preaching. In his pastoral visits a minister can come to close quarters with individual souls, and preach eye to eye. No one can dodge such preaching or go to sleep under it.

As many souls are won to Christ outside the church as within it. Eloquence or fine music may attract a crowd; but a mass meeting is not a church. Nothing but thorough pastoral work (in its widest sense) can organize, train, and develop a compact, praying, money-giving, mission-working, society-leavening, and soul-saving church. No earthly throne comes within ten leagues of such a pulpit; no monarch's crown compares in splendour with the diadem which the glorified Jesus will place on the brow of every successful minister—whose success was only won by burying self out of sight and exalting, like Paul—"Christ and Him crucified."

What this old sinning and suffering world needs most is more such ministers at home and in foreign fields. Shall it not have them?

True Ambition.—These lives of ours, hurrying on in their ambitions, spreading out in their loves—they are capable of being filled with God. Without losing their eager pursuit of their appointed task, without losing their cordial reaching after the lives around them, they shall be quietly, steadily, nobly lifted into something of the peace and dignity of the God whom they aspire to.—Phillips Brooks.

A Picture of Peace.—In the Pitti Palace at Florence hangs a picture which represents a stormy sea, with wild waves and black clouds, and fierce lightnings flashing across the sky. Wrecks float on the angry waters, and here and there a human face is seen. Out of the midst of the waves a rock rises, against which the waters dash in vain. It towers high above the crest of the waves. In a cleft of the rock are some tufts of grass and green herbage, with sweet flowers blooming, and amid these a dove is seen, sitting on her nest, quiet and undisturbed by the wild fury of the storm, or the mad dashing of the waves below her. The picture fitly represents the peace of the Christian amid the sorrows and trials of the world. He is hidden in the cleft of the Rock of Ages, and nestles securely in the bosom of God's unchanging love.—J. R. Miller.

"As for You, the Anointing."

(1 John ii. 27, R.V.)

By Pastor F. E. MARSH.

"THE anointing" is the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in His Divine personality and grace. The anointings of Scripture illustrate His work and worth in the life of the child of God.

I. Holy by His Presence.—"Moses took the anointing oil, and anointed the Tabernacle and all that was therein, and sanctified them" (Lev. viii. 10). The Tabernacle is a type of the believer in Christ, and the anointing oil is typical of the sanctifying presence of the Holy Spirit. We are holy in His holiness, loving in His love, strong in His strength, tender in His tenderness, patient in His patience, calm in His peace, and consecrated in His consecration. Get out of touch with Him by neglecting prayer, and the fragrance of His presence is wanting.

II. Consecrated in His Grace.—The cleansed leper had the oil put upon four places, namely, upon the right ear, right thumb, right great toe, and upon his head (Lev. xiv. 17). Those who are cleansed and sanctified by the blood of Christ (for the "oil shall be put upon the blood") are consecrated by the oil of anointing for God and His service. The head of our thought (1 Cor. ii. 9-16), the ear of our attention (Rev. ii. 7), the hand of our labour (Act i. 8), and the feet of our walk (Gal. v. 16) must all be "in the Spirit" to be consecrated to God's glory.

III. Qualified by His Enduement.—When Elijah was about to be removed from his office the Lord told him to anoint Elisha prophet in his stead (1 Kings xix. 16). The oil of anointing was poured upon the man who was to be the Lord's prophet, as shadowing forth the power which qualified him for his office. An old name for a prophet was a seer, that is, one who, through his fellowship with God, was initiated into His secrets, and was thus able to tell and foretell them. Every believer by the Spirit's power may be a seer. By the Spirit's power we see sin's evil working (Rom. vii. 23), Christ's exalted position (Heb. ii. 9), Grace's effective calling (1 Cor. i. 26), Heaven's opened door (John i. 51), God's gracious being (Matt. v. 8), Unbelief's hardening process (Heb. iii. 19), and the Millennium's near approach (Heb. x. 25).

IV. Healed in His life.—When the Good Samaritan found the man who had fallen among thieves, he poured into his wounds oil and wine (Luke x. 34). This may be taken to illustrate the healing grace of the Holy Spirit. His love will heal us of the evil of hatred (Acts vii. 55). His sweetness will heal us of the ill of bad temper (Rom. xii. 17). His holiness will heal us of the wilfulness of sin (Rom. viii. 2). His fruit will heal us of the works of the flesh (Gal. v. 22). His joy will heal us of the bitterness of sorrow (Acts ix. 31). His Word will heal us of the blight of unbelief (1 John. iii. 24), and His leading will heal us of the perplexity of doubt (Acts xvi. 6).

V. Worshipping in His power. To Aaron and his sons it was said: "The anointing oil of the Lord is upon you" (Lev. x. 7). The various things which Aaron and his sons were to do typify what believers are called upon to do in the exercise of their holy priesthood. The "priest who was anointed" is continually referred to (Lev. iii. 3, 5, 16; Num. iii. 3) as the one who had the right to act; and only those who are made priests through faith in Christ have the true qualification to worship God, whether it be in sanctified praise or in religious service. Continually we read in the book of Leviticus "The priest shall." No less than over a hundred times does the sentence occur, and these do not include the equivalent expression, "he shall." Here is a fruitful line of study.

VI. Victorious in His might.—"Thou shalt anoint him to be captain, that he may save My people" (1 Sam. ix. 16), is the Divine word regarding the setting apart of Saul as King of Israel. We shall be saved and used as we know the Spirit's might. "The power of His might" (Eph. vi. 10) is the strength which is requisite in order to put on the armour of God, and "the Lord the Mighty Man of valour" (Septuagint version of Judges vi. 12), being with us, who can stand before His presence? Certainly not the flesh (Gal. v. 16).

VII. Authoritative in His equipment.—All the kings of Israel were anointed with the consecrating oil. Of David it was said, "He was anointed king over Israel" (2 Sam. v. 3). In the Book of Proverbs, the following are said to be the true traits of God's kings:—They are Divinely appointed (Prov. viii. 15), they are haters of wickedness (Prov. xvi. 12), they are righteous in life (Prov. xvi. 12, 13), they are powerful in action (Prov. xx. 2, 8, 26), dependent on mercy (Prov. xx. 28), friendly to the true (Prov. xxii. 11), and considerate of the needy (Prov. xxix. 14). Let us, by the Spirit's consecrating grace, be true to the appointment of grace, haters of evil, right in life, powerful in testimony, dependent on Christ, friendly to the upright, and helpers of the needy.

"Our Daily Bread."

When leaving England recently for the West Indies, our esteemed contributor, Rev. F. B. Meyer, was sorry to learn, at the last moment, that he would be unable to mail the notes for this week in time for insertion. In these circumstances, the week's readings are supplied from Mr. Meyer's excellent work, OUR DAILY HOMILY.—ED.

SUNDAY, December 14.

Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel.—2 Kings x. 31.

JEHU was the Cromwell of his time. He swept away the symbols of idolatry with ruthless destruction. Nothing could withstand his iconoclastic enthusiasm. But he failed to keep his own heart, and therefore his dynasty lasted for but one generation. It is a deep lesson for us all.

We may keep other people's vineyards, and neglect our own. We may give good advice to our friends, but fall into the very faults against which we warn them. We may pose as infallible guides, but fall into the crevasses and precipices from which we had carefully warned our companions. Jehu avenged the idolatries of Ahab, but he departed not from Jeroboam's calves.

Before you rebuke another, be sure that you are free from the faults that you detect in him. When you hear of the failings of some erring brother, ask yourself whether you are perfectly free from them. And never attempt to cast out the mote from your neighbour's eye till you are sure that the beam has been taken from your own.

Take heed to your heart. Its complexion colours all the issues of life. Do not be content to be strong against evil; be eagerly ambitious of good. It is easier to be vehement against the abominations of others than to judge and put away your own secret sins. But while we keep our heart with all diligence, we cannot afford to be independent of the keeping power of God. We must yield ourselves to Him, reserving nothing. The King must have all.

MONDAY, December 15.

They made him king, and anointed him.—2 Kings xi. 12.

This dexterous overthrow of Athaliah by the bringing of the youthful king, who had been hidden in the secret chambers of the Temple, accommodates itself so obviously to a reference to the inner life, that we must be pardoned for making it.

Is not the spiritual condition of too many children of God represented by the condition of the Temple during the early years of the life of Joash? The king was within its precincts, the rightful heir of the crown and defender of the worship of Jehovah; but, as a matter of fact, the crown was on the head of the usurper Athaliah, who was exercising a cruel and sanguinary tyranny. The king was limited to a chamber, and the majority of the priests, with all the people, had not even heard of his existence. So, unless we are reprobates, Jesus is within the spirit, which has been regenerated by the Holy Ghost; but in too many cases He is limited to a very small corner of our nature, and exercises but a limited power over our life.

There needs to be an anointing, an enthroning, a determination that He shall exercise his power over the entire Temple of our being:—the spirit, which stands for the Holy of Holies; the soul, for the Holy Place; the body, for the outer court.

If we would have holiness, we must be infilled by the Holy One. But there must be no limiting of His power, no barrier to His control, no veiling or curtailing of His light. The veil, if such there be, must be rent in twain from the top to the bottom.

TUESDAY, December 16.

All the money that it cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of the Lord.—2 Kings xii. 4. (R.V.)

For the reconstruction of the Temple there were two classes of revenue: the tribute money which each Israelite was bound to give, and the money which a man might feel prompted to give. Surely the latter was the more precious in the eye of God.

Does it ever come into your heart to bring some money into the house of God? Perhaps the suggestion comes, but you put it away, and refuse to consider it. The thought begins to ascend in your heart, but you thrust it down and back, saying, Why should I part with what has cost me so much to get! Beware of stifling these generous promptings. To yield to them would bring untold blessing into heart and life. Besides, the money is only yours as a stewardship, and the thought to give it to God is only the Master's request for His own.

The great mistake with us all is, that we do not hold all our property at God's disposal, seeking His directions for its administration, and that we forget how freely we have received, that we may resemble our Father in heaven, and freely give. Too many, alas! are anxious to hoard up and keep for themselves that which God has given them, instead of counting themselves and all they have as purchased property, and using all things as His representatives and trustees. Let us make a complete surrender to our Lord, and from the heart sing—

> Take my silver and my gold,
> Not a mite would I withhold.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

He smote thrice, and stayed.—2 Kings xiii. 18.

A striking spectacle. The dying prophet, with his thin hands on the muscular hands of the young king, as he shoots his arrow through the eastern window; the exhortation to smite the remaining arrows on the ground; the bitter chiding that the king had struck thrice only, instead of five or six times. What lessons are here! The Lord Jesus put His hands upon ours. Here is the reverse to the incident referred to. Ours are weak, His are strong; ours would miss the mark, His will direct the arrows, if only we will allow Him, with unerring precision. We shoot, but the Lord directs the arrow's flight to the hearts of His foes.

Our success is commensurate with our faith. If we strike but thrice, we conquer but thrice. If we strike seven times, we attain a perfect victory over the adversary. Is not this the cause of comparative failure in Gospel effort? Souls are not saved, because we do not expect them to be saved. A few are saved, because we only believe for a few. It is one of the most radical laws in the universe of God, and one which our Lord repeatedly emphasized, that our faith determines the less or more in our own growth, and in the victories we win for Christ. Do not stay, O soul-winner, but smite again and yet again in the secret of thy chamber, that thou mayest smite Satan, and compel him to acknowledge thy might.

Let us not stay, though the energy of earlier days may be ebbing fast. The sanctified spirit waxes only stronger and more heroic, as Elisha's and Paul's did, amid the decay of mortal power. The Lord will say to us, as He did to Paul, "My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness."

THURSDAY, December 18.

Every man shall be put to death for his own sin.—2 Kings xiv. 6.

So ran the law of Moses. It forbade the imposition of punishment on the relatives of the wrong-doer, but it had no mercy on him. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," was the succinct and conclusive verdict of the older law, in this reflecting the spirit and letter of one yet older, which ran, "The day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."

First, we were dead in our sins.—Eph. ii. 1 puts this beyond all doubt. In the sight of God, all who walk according to the course of this world, and obey the prince that now worketh in the children of this world, are dead in trespasses and sins. However much they may be alive as to their souls, they are dead as to their spirits, entirely destitute of the life of God.

Second, we have died for our sins.—2 Cor. v. 14, 15 (R.V.) establishes this fact, and shows that in Jesus, we who believe in Him are reckoned to have died in Him when He bore our sins in his own body on the tree. In God's estimate, his death is imputed to us; so that we are reckoned as having satisfied, in Jesus, the demands of a broken law. It has no more to ask.

Third, we must die to our sin.—Rom. vi. 11. Reckon that you have died, and whenever sin arises, to menace or allure you, point back to the grave, and argue that since you died in Christ, you have passed altogether beyond its jurisdiction, for you have yielded your members as weapons of righteousness unto God. And having been crucified with Christ, you now no longer live, but Christ liveth in you. Let it become your daily habit to place the grave of Jesus between yourself and all allurements of the world, the flesh, and the devil.

FRIDAY, December 19.

The sins of Jeroboam—the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.—2 Kings xv. 9, 18, 24, 28.

This chapter anticipates the final overthrow of the kingdom of the tribes. It describes the corruption and disorganization of the people, which made them the easy prey of Assyria. Four times over it is said that they followed in the steps of Jeroboam, "who made Israel to sin." The seed sown two hundred years before had at last come to maturity, issuing in the ruin of the nation. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."

Twelve times in the story of the kingdom of Israel we are told that Jeroboam—the son of Nebat, made Israel to sin. The institution of the calves on his part seemed to be a piece of political wisdom, but it was an infraction of the Divine law; and what is morally wrong can never be politically right. The house cannot stand unless the foundation can bear the test of the Divine plummet. The kingdom of Israel fell, to prove to all after-time that the disregard of God's law is a foundation of sand, which can never resist the test of time.

Why is Jeroboam so frequently called "the son of Nebat"? Why should the father be for ever pilloried with the son, except that he was in some way responsible for, and implicated in, his sins? There was a time when perhaps Nebat might have restrained the growing boy, or led him to the true worship of God; or perhaps his parental influence and example were deadly in their effect. Let parents leave no stone unturned to bring up their children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

SATURDAY, December 20.

King Ahaz sent to Urijah the fashion of the altar and the pattern of it.—2 Kings xvi. 10.

The fashion of this world passeth away like a fleeting dream; or like a panorama of clouds, which constitutes a pavilion of the setting sun, but which, whilst we gaze, tumbles into a mass of red ruin. And yet we are always so prone to imitate King Ahaz, and visit Damascus with the intention of procuring the latest design, and introducing it into the service of the sanctuary!

Man naturally imitates. He must get the pattern of his work from above or beneath; from God or the devil: hence the repeated injunction to us all, to make all things "after the pattern shown on the mount." If we would be rid of the influence of worldly fashion, we must conform ourselves to the heavenly and Divine. The pattern of the Body of Christ—of the position of each individual believer among its members, and of the work which each should accomplish—was fixed before the worlds were made. The best cure for worldliness is not unworldliness, but other-worldliness. The best way of resisting the trend of people around us is to cultivate the speech, thought, and behaviour of that celestial world to which we are bound by the most sacred ties.

This introduction of the altar of a heathen shrine into the holy temple of Jerusalem reminds us of the many rites in modern religious observances which have been borrowed from paganism, and warns us that the Church has no right to go to the world for its methods and principles. Let the world do as it may in its discussions about truth, its efforts to attract attention, and its organizations; our course is clear—not to build altars after its fashion, nor model our life on its maxims.*

THE ROBIN DINNER FUND.

SUBSCRIPTIONS

(which are urgently needed if we are to provide for as many children as last year) should be sent addressed to the Hon. Secs., JOHN KIRK and C. ASHTON BULLOCK, "Robin" Dinner Fund, 11, Ludgate Square, London, E.C.

To the Readers of "The Christian."

Dear Reader,

Last year, by the kindness of many friends of Robin, many little Robins had their usual winter's treat.

This year thousands of young Robins will be opening their beaks. Who will help to throw them some crumbs? Nearly £1,000 needed to feed the usual number. Will not the rich (are we not all rich compared with our Robins?) follow our Lord's words and make a feast for those who can make no return?

Donations will be most thankfully received and acknowledged.

Yours faithfully,
ROBIN.

THE FUNDS

are not to provide Relief Dinners, but to welcome the little ones as guests in the Name of and for the sake of Him Who loved little children.

GATHERED CRUMBS.

Gathered Crumbs may be sent to the Hon. Secs., ROBIN DINNER FUND, 11, Ludgate Square, London, E.C. Your Sixpence, at least, to entertain one child, and then the sixpences of your family and friends.

WHAT IS THE ROBIN DINNER FUND?

A Fund, started twenty-two years ago by the Rev. Charles Bullock, B.D., to give a Christmas Dinner and evening's enjoyment to children of the great city, who have never known a Christmas party.

WHAT THE ROBIN DINNERS ARE NOT.

We cannot too strongly point out that the Robin Dinners are not Pauperising Relief Meals. They are hospitable Christmas Parties. We ask the rich (are we not all rich compared with our Robins?) to follow our Lord's words and make a feast for those who can make no return. May this be the "cup of cold water" this Christmas.

HOW MANY CHILDREN DO WE REACH?

About 24,000 every year at present. But there are thousands on thousands more we could and would entertain right royally if you will help us with Christmas bounty.

HOW IS THE FUND ADMINISTERED?

By a Committee of well-known Clergy and Laymen working in the poorest districts. There is no rent of offices or payment of officials. The whole work is voluntary, and every penny goes directly to the children through the agency of those who know best how to use it—either the clergy living and labouring in the poorest parishes of London, or through the Ragged School Union.

WHAT DOES THE PRESS SAY?

The Christian said:—"The children seemed immensely delighted, and evidently enjoyed a thoroughly happy evening. The Robin Dinner is a fund of delight."

The Daily Graphic said:—"It is a touching and pretty sight to watch the gatherings of the hungry clans. It is a grand thing to teach the ignorant, but it is a much grander, simpler, more necessary thing to feed the hungry; and to give cheerless lives something to look forward to and to look back upon is, perhaps, the most useful of all."

The Daily Telegraph said:—"Nothing could be more satisfactory. The Robin Dinner speaks for itself."

The MARIE HILTON CRÈCHE, INFANT INFIRMARY and BABIES' HOUSE:

16, Stepney Causeway, London, E. FOUNDED 1871.

PATRON - - H.R.H. PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.

ONE OF THE NURSERIES IN THE STEPNEY CAUSEWAY CRÈCHE.

MR. JOHN HILTON and the TRUSTEES of the MARIE HILTON CRÈCHE feel compelled to make a VERY EARNEST APPEAL for further help to maintain the good and gracious work which has been carried on for years among poor but industrious East-end mothers and their little infants, at the Crèche, founded by the late Mrs. John Hilton, at 16, Stepney Causeway, E.

Thousands of decent poor mothers, who have had to go out daily to earn a pittance, and who could not take their babies with them, have been by means of the Crèche enabled to go off to their work with quiet and contented minds, after having consigned their little ones to the care and guardianship of the devoted nurses of Babies' House. Yet that good and useful work, like many kindred Institutions of late, has been sadly hindered by want of funds, and there is a very URGENT NEED for liberal Special Contributions at this time. GIFTS OF CLOTHING, TOYS, &c., will also be very acceptable.

All communications in response should be addressed to Mr. JOHN HILTON, Treasurer, at the Marie Hilton Crèche, 16, Stepney Causeway, London, E., who will gratefully acknowledge their receipt.

Cheques or P.O. Orders payable to John Hilton, should be crossed "London and County Bank."

"An Hungred . . and ye Visited Me."

Dear Reader of "The Christian,"

The cold weather which we are now experiencing helps the well-to-do and the healthy to enjoy life even more abundantly. But what of the very poor?

In East London there are thousands of squalid homes where a fall in the temperature means the accentuation of the miseries of life, already so bereft of comfort as to be almost unendurable. There are lives in which want is the one permanent, never-changing factor! Into such poor homes where there is scanty fuel, threadbare clothing, and insufficient food, the cold of winter carries intense suffering!

We are doing what we can to relieve, as far as limited means will permit, the most deserving of such poor people as these around us. Every day teems with illustrations of urgent need: cases of the Feeble and the Aged, of the Sick, who feel perhaps most keenly the lack of warmth, and of the Young, who are often so puny and ill-nourished.

May I ask you who have in time past shown your sympathy with this aspect of the work of rescue carried on through our Homes to spare a little for the relief of these poor ones outside of the Homes, whom we have under regular visitation?

Gladly will I be your almoner to those to whom a gift of fuel, or a few warm meals, or a needful garment or two may mean almost a new lease of life!

Yours sincerely in the service of Christ among His poor,

Thos. J. Barnardo.

Terrible Distress Among the Poor.

"The Empty Cupboard."

101, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

DEAR FRIENDS,

The Poverty and Distress existing among the Unemployed and Destitute is really heart-breaking. Trade in many directions is worse than for years past, and the number of men, women, and children who are literally too poor to find pence to buy shelter or food is exceedingly large. We are compelled to turn away many hundreds of applicants nightly, although we house over 6,000. We have felt bound to relieve about 500 men and women nightly during the midnight hours by gifts of soup and bread, but we ought to open four more centres at once in London alone. We are also giving many hundreds of hungry little ones a substantial breakfast every morning for one farthing. The daily story of want and woe is indeed a terrible one, and we earnestly ask for the prayers and the financial aid of all readers. Contributions, both large and small, will be gratefully acknowledged by Mrs. BRAMWELL BOOTH.

> The Daily Express of December 5th says:—"A halfpenny loaf is the staple food daily of from 3,000 to 4,000 known persons, and yesterday 500 men were turned away from the Salvation Army's Whitechapel Shelter, some lying stretched on the streets and in corners!"

Cheques and Post Office Orders should be crossed "Bank of England," and sent to the Salvation Army Headquarters at above address.

To meet this amount the ordinary income is inadequate. The pensioners live in all parts of the country, and most of them are upwards of seventy years of age.

"Furth of the Kingdom."

BY THOS. J. BARNARDO, F.R.C.S., ED.

"And so more and more I cannot help looking to the West. There is the world as the world will be. There are the things one hopes for, and cares for, and lives for."—JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

THE alternative in the hanging days was to be banished "furth of the kingdom." But the old-time curse has been turned into a blessing. We have learned that the best that life has to give can often be found in the new world beyond the seas. Our Homes have done their best to drive this teaching home, and I have now over 13,000 object-lessons in the modern art of emigration! To be accurate, I have up to date sent out "furth of the kingdom," to Canada and to British Colonies, 13,657 boys and girls. Less than 300 of that large army have in thirty years disappointed me. Not one in fifty has failed in his or her after-life! More than 13,300 have records of which no one needs to be ashamed—and these records are closely and minutely compiled!

Our emigration season for 1902 has now come to a close. In this, as in some other directions, we have made a record. Never in any single previous twelvemonth have I sent out so many young people. Here is my detailed emigration record for the current year:—

JOE SIMPKINS, AS I FIRST SAW HIM.

			Boys.		Girls.
First	Party	Mar. 27.....	231	+	5	= 236
Second	,,	May 1.....	—		105	= 105
Third	,,	July 17.....	276	+	119	= 395
Fourth	,,	Sept. 25.....	177	+	140	= 317
Total			684	+	369	= 1,053

Up to the end of 1901 my emigrants numbered 12,604. Including the record of 1902, therefore, I have now the names of 13,657 young people on my emigration roll. Prosperity has waited on many of these: riches on not a few: honour and position on some. Better even than these are the records of the great majority: undistinguished, perhaps, as the world counts distinction; but marked by the good old homespun virtues of fidelity, uprightness, diligence, trustworthiness. And many of those lives there are stamped with the signs of the grace of God. They are walking in Christian ways, and doing their duty, not as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart. I thank my God daily at every remembrance of them!

A SUCCESSFUL EMIGRANT.

What has been accomplished in and for these children of our streets ere we can venture to send them forth is well illustrated by a glance at the case of JOE SIMPKINS, whose face, as it looks out at me from the pages of my album, brings a whole train of past events to my mind. I and another had been out all night a-fishing. I passed Spitalfields Market at five in the morning, with four or five youngsters whom I had picked up in my night's wanderings. These ragged urchins attracted a good deal of attention as they surrounded me and as we walked down Commercial Street together. I am free to admit that their appearance was picturesque and even startling enough to have accounted for some public notice; but I was a good deal annoyed by the conduct of one little tattered rascallion, who appeared to have tumbled out of a basket near Spitalfields Market, and who followed my group with quizzical glances and ironical exclamations of admiration.

Sometimes he would run in front, and make believe to clear the pavement of passers-by, as though to provide easy access for us, shouting out all the while, "Make way there; make way! Here is the Lord Mayor and all his Coort!" At other times he would dart behind and comment audibly upon the chequered appearance of my followers, who squirmed a good bit under his sarcasms, and who, I was afraid once or twice, would have bolted. With a sigh of relief I found myself in Whitechapel Road close to a cabstand, and, calling a four-wheel cab, I bundled all my young charges into it. Not that thereby I was wholly delivered from my troublesome satellite! His eyes grew big, and he puffed out his cheeks when he saw me hailing the cab, and watched the children enter. "Lor's a mussy," he shouted, "'ere's the swells a-going into their carriage." When we had got in, and I had given the driver directions, the young rascal jumped up behind, clinging in some fashion to the springs at the back, and attracting, even at that early hour, general attention by the grimaces and comments with which he favoured us inside.

When we reached our Stepney Causeway Home, our self-constituted footman jumped briskly down from his perch, and opened the cab door with profound exclamations of mock reverence. It was supremely ridiculous to see this ragged youngster bowing to us as though overcome with a sense of our importance! It was unnecessary to take many glances at him to observe that, merry and humorous as he was, he was but a poor waif and stray himself! While I conveyed the three boys and the girl, who constituted my "night's catch," safely into the house, Joe stood talking to the cabman. That talk did the business! The cabman told him he was a young fool for his pains—that those boys and the girl I had taken inside would in a few days be better off than ever he had been in all his life, and, as Joe afterwards told me, informed him also that it would be a "lump sight better" if he had asked the guv'nor to take him in too, rather than make fun of us. "Lor," said Joe, "I never thought he'd have me; would he?" Being assured of this, Joe pulled a most lachrymose face on my reappearance. He was a "pore chap who hadn't no home, nor nothink"! Wouldn't I take him in?

A few words with him convinced me that his object was not, as I first thought, to continue his jocose annoyances. But for safety's sake I took the little fellow forthwith into one of our Branch homes adjoining, gave him a good warm meal at once, let him enjoy the comfort of a hot bath, and then packed him off to bed. He slept for ten hours at a stretch, and when he woke, he said to the Matron, who just chanced to be by his bedside as he stretched his arms, "I say, old lady, when is my dinner a-comin'?" Needless to say, very soon

WILLIE CORNER: AS CANADA HAS MADE HIM.

I had all the items of Joe's history, as he reported them, entered in my book, and I dispatched one of our beadles to make searching inquiry into their truth. When I found out that he was indeed a genuine waif and stray, an arab of the streets, the doors of our Home were at once opened to him. The fuller story of Joe Simpkins, and all that befel him in the Home and since he left it for Canada, would take too long to tell now; but I may say that it is satisfactory in the extreme.

Meanwhile a glance at Joe's face will indicate the rough nature of the raw material with which I have to deal when, in the providence of God, these homeless wastrels reach me, not merely from London, but from the streets of all our great towns, and gradually, by training and Christian influences, are fitted for their future lives either in England or in the Colonies. It is much to lift children from the pit of destitution and the slough of neglect. But how much greater and more blessed a thing it is to see these very waifs and wastrels, once the shame and the sorrow of civilization and of Christianity, blossom into men and women of decent lives, of upright and tested characters, and above all, as has happened in so many instances, with unmistakable signs of the transforming grace of God, bearing sure and certain fruit in their walk and conversation!

AN ADOPTED ORPHAN.

Susan's is a story of worldly prosperity following an early record of the most unpromising nature. Two sisters entered the homes together, Susan and Kate; they had been rendered orphans by the death of their father, who was killed when at his work in a village in Sussex. His poor wife, with seven children under thirteen, and with broken down health, struggled on bravely, working in the fields and striving by any labour that offered to keep her small home together. At length her health gave way, and but for out-door relief from the workhouse and the charity of those who knew of her struggle, she must have succumbed altogether. Eventually things became worse; she and her children were reduced to starvation point. Then application was made to me, and after considering all the facts of the case, I decided to lighten the widow's burden by admitting two of her girls.

Of these Susan was the elder. She was a sweet little maiden, and endeared herself greatly to those who had her in charge during her residence in the Homes. When at length it seemed right to send her to Canada, we all parted from her with great regret. She was only six years of age when she left England. Almost immediately after her arrival she was taken over by a worthy farmer and his wife, who gave themselves up to the task of training this child in a very thorough and beautiful fashion. Our communications by visit and by letter were frequent and regular, and we were very thankful when, after some time of trial, her foster-parents decided to "adopt" the little girl altogether, and to treat her as if she were a member of their family.

LEGAL PRECAUTIONS.

The usual documents to ratify an agreement of this sort were executed. I may here say that such adoption, possible in Canada, gives a prospect to the child which is absolutely unattainable, owing to the state of the law, in Great Britain. For that reason I never lend myself to the adoption of children in this country; but in Canada, if only I can make sure that the people to whom a child goes are really kindly, well-disposed, and prosperous people, I have no hesitation in arranging for the adoption of the little ones I send out.

Susan grew apace; grew in the favour and affection of her foster-parents; received a good education; indeed, she eventually qualified so to become herself a teacher, if she had chosen that occupation. I have a great pile of entries before me in her record, almost each of which testifies to the success of the experiment and to the happiness of the child. Then came a notable event, only three years ago: nothing less than her marriage to a son of the house in which she had been brought up as an adopted daughter! A letter before me, received recently, tells me of her happy married life, of the advent of a little son, and of the brightness and joyousness of her hopes. Ah, will the story ever be fully told of the endless number of young lives which, through the medium of our Homes, have been elevated and made prosperous and happy? Perhaps not—but their record is on high! Assuredly, at all events, Susan's name will appear on that roll of success!

A GUEST AT A WAIFS' SUPPER.

Somewhat different from Susan's is the life story of Willie Corner. By this time he has grown into a fine, manly fellow, independent and respectable. But when I first met him one could never have hoped that he would become what he now is. Well do I remember his presence at one of the suppers I give to street children, which are held each January. Some one had given him a decent jacket, he said, the day before; but he had no shirt on, and only a rough muffler round his neck. He presented a very dirty, ragged, and unkempt appearance, even among the 2,000 shivering guests who accepted my invitation to the Annual Waifs' Supper. Presently he was found among the lads who volunteered, at my invitation, to leave their street life at once, and to seek admission there and then to the homes.

On such occasions I am assisted by several shorthand clerks, who take down rapidly the ipsissima verba of the statements made by my guests. In the record now before me I find that Willie thus spoke of his past life: "I have dossed at nearly all the lodging-houses in Brick Lane. Before that I used to live with my stepmother at ——. My father and mother are both dead. I have one sister, Mrs. Lamb, whose husband is a dock labourer out of work, now living in Thrawl Street, Brick Lane. Sometimes they give me a shakedown for the night, but they have only one room. I was once employed at the Great Eastern Railway as a van-boy, and got 8s. a week. Since last April I have done nothing except odd jobs here and there. I am sick of a street life. Please let me come into the Homes."

A DREADFUL WOMAN.

Willie was admitted temporarily. I sheltered him while a searching investigation was made into his past career. His statements were found to be accurate. One of our experienced search-agents visited the step-mother, with whom the boy had lived a short time, and from the report then made I quote the following pregnant lines. My agent wrote: "The woman Corner is, I think, one of the most dreadful-looking women I have ever seen. She is degraded to the last degree. Her face was blotched, and deeply scratched all over. She appeared quite brutalised, and she is known all round as a fighting, drinking, and dissolute woman. Concerning Willie, she said he had not been doing any good for her for a long time, and she would be glad if he could be sent out of the country."

Thereupon I admitted Willie to our Homes. The training and discipline soon had a marked effect, and when I had satisfied myself that he was honest, industrious, and deserving of help, I sent him out to Canada. There he throve and prospered from the first, and his reports grew almost monotonous in their story of progress. He has grown into a fine young man, and he is saving, hard working, industrious, and earning high wages. He is a total abstainer and a communicant. Willie's grateful feeling towards the Homes shows itself in contributions frequently received, and in letters in which he is never tired of setting forth the debt he owes to the Institutions for their helping hand in his extremity. Here is an extract from the very last report I have of this lad—taken, be it remembered, as he was from the streets and a common lodging-house, and from associations with evil in every shape:—"Willie is a thoroughly deserving, respectable young fellow, whose conduct has been always highly satisfactory. He is a member of the Church, and a very loyal supporter of the Homes."

A LETTER FROM CANADA.

As a sample of the gratitude of our young emigrants, it may be interesting to quote a letter just received from George W., who is now doing so well in Canada that he is able to send 10dols. to the Homes through whose instrumentality he was taken off the streets of London and sent to the new country. Of the land of his adoption George writes, as the result of seven years' experience, "I think it is the best country in the world." "Lots of work to be had," and "first-rate health" no doubt help to give a "rosy" tint to life, but in the case of George there is the added joy of being consciously enlisted in the service of the Great King. "I bless the day," he adds, "when, friendless and homeless, I came to you and you gave me a helping hand, saving my body from cold and hunger, and being the first means of saving my soul through Jesus my Saviour." Truly, such testimony is a very real encouragement! Afresh I thank God and take courage, in spite of the many difficulties incidental to the care of my enormous family! What these "difficulties" are I must not now fully declare, but some day I may be able to do so. and then Christian England will, I think, open wide its eyes when it hears of the obstacles and opposition meted out to us by those who should have encouraged and supported us. "Your work is a beautiful one," wrote an eminent lady distinguished in art and literature, a short time back; but it is too religious for me!" And there are doubtless many who think with her. Yet, surely, such objectors forget that the most formative and abiding influences that any of us have ever known were those we enjoyed as children at our mothers' knees! Why then should the children of the poorest, whose earliest lives have in the majority of instances been surrounded by the unclean and the demoralizing, be deprived of the only means given among men by which these lives may be redeemed and purified?

47,000 BOYS AND GIRLS.

One significant fact remains to be pondered over, that the greatest family I suppose in the whole world is to-day under my care, numbering over 6,200 rescued boys and girls of all ages, and every twenty-four hours some nine souls are being added. Furthermore, of the 47,000 who have passed through my hands, 13,657, as already stated, have been successfully placed out in our colonies, while 27,000 of my trained boys and girls are filling respectable situations at home.

Facts like these are stubborn things, and their argument is irresistible in favour of such an enterprise as mine, whereby so many boys and girls, once forlorn and destitute, have in the providence of God been reached and rescued ere it was too late! As I have often said, the homeless waif, succoured by a wise and timely benevolence, is not only saved for the nation, but it may also be for the Kingdom of Heaven!

Marylebone Medical Mission.

STARTED by Dr. Chambers in 1876, the Marylebone Medical Mission is still pursuing its useful course under the active direction of its esteemed founder. It would be difficult to find a poorer or more needy population than that in the immediate vicinity of the Mission, and a visit to the dispensary affords ready proof of the remarkable extent to which Dr. Chambers has secured the confidence and respect of the people.

All kinds of people find help, the poor costermonger, the bootblack, the crossing sweeper, the dwellers in the vast districts of "mean streets" which are the abodes of sordid misery. Here the doctor is indeed a welcome visitor in the one-roomed homes in which, in many instances, whole families are crowded. Amid such surroundings it is only to be expected that disease should abound; hence the workers of the Mission are invariably busy in their ministry of love.

The general work of the Mission begins every morning at 9.30. The dispensary is open three days a week, but urgent cases are seen every day. At one o'clock all the patients are assembled for a Gospel service, lasting about twenty minutes. Very many, at these services, hear the Gospel who never enter any church or mission hall. After the service each patient is seen separately in the consulting room, and prescribed for by the medical superintendent. Those too ill to attend the dispensary are visited at their own homes by Dr. Chambers, and the cases visited at home are certainly as severe as those to be seen in the wards of a hospital. The deaconess also visits daily. Sickness and poverty are the only recommendations any patient requires in order to obtain the benefits of this useful undertaking.

Dr. Chambers' work is first of all religious. The governing aim is to win souls for Christ. Since the starting of the Mission vast numbers of the sick poor have been cured, others relieved; drunkards have been reclaimed; and many who, when they came to the dispensary, were living without God, are now living consistent Christian lives.

Dr. Chambers' address is 12, Bell Street, Lisson Grove, W.

Sixty Years of Useful Work.

THE NATIONAL REFUGES.

IT is gratifying to record that the beneficent work of the National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children continues with unabated vigour. The Society is within a short period of completing its sixtieth year, and never was it more popular than it is to-day.

The training ships Arethusa and Chichester have now their full complement of 200 lads, all of whom are of good character and destined for the Royal Navy and merchant service. During this year as many as 900 boys and girls have been wholly maintained, technically trained, and religiously educated in the Society's eight Homes and two training ships. Since the commencement of the work, 16,500 destitute children have thus been incalculably benefited by the institution.

As time goes on, the committee experience more and more the advantage of the entire absence of the voting system, as they are able to grant immediate admission to urgent cases. A further improvement has been introduced during the past year, whereby destitute children, for whom there may not be room in the Homes at the moment, are boarded out pending vacancies. This offers a glad relief to the distressed mother as well as to the poor child.

In the histories of institutions, as of individuals, it sometimes happens that what our Lord seems to withhold with one hand He gives abundantly with the other. This truth has been experienced by the National Refuges during the past year. For although the ordinary subscriptions and donations have fluctuated unfavourably, the deficit has been made up by legacies. Thus, happily, the good work has been carried on unimpeded, and the committee have been enabled to effect great improvements in the freehold buildings of the Society, improvements rendered necessary by the ravages of time and the demands for up-to-date construction.

A feeling of deep thankfulness to Almighty God, therefore, pervades the committee, that they are permitted to see the Society, after sixty years of work, still vigorous and efficient. Readers of The Christian who have the leisure to visit the Homes and Ships of the National Refuges would find such personal inspection full of interest and pleasure. The secretary, Mr. H. Bristow Wallen, may be seen at the London headquarters, 164, Shaftesbury Avenue, and would gladly give the fullest details of the work. All branches of the Society are open for inspection through the week (except Sundays) at any time of the day. This invitation is no mere matter of form. The Homes are situated as follows:—London Refuge and Technical School, 164, Shaftesbury Avenue; Fordham House, Working-Boys' Home, 164A, Shaftesbury Avenue; Fortescue House, Boys' Home, London Road, Twickenham; the Farm School and Shaftesbury School, Bisley, Surrey; Arethusa Depôt and Shipping Agency, 100, East India Dock Road, E.; Sudbury Hall, Girls' Home, Wembley, Middlesex; Ealing House, Girls' Home, St. Mary's Road, Ealing, W. The Society also maintains a shipping agency at Newport, Monmouthshire.

Among the incidents of the year, it may be mentioned that the Society was honoured by an invitation from their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales for two hundred and fifty of the boys and girls to view the Coronation procession from the gardens of Marlborough House on August 9. Accompanied by the splendid brass band of the Twickenham Home, the party included a detachment of smart young sailors from the Arethusa, and all of them were most sumptuously entertained by their Royal hosts.

The happy conclusion of the war has resulted in the return of many "old boys," who have nobly served their country in South Africa. Scarcely a week passes without the Homes being visited by bronzed soldiers or sailors, who manifest a most affectionate regard and appreciation of their old school and its staff of teachers. But let it not be thought that a military element predominates in the work. The boys in the Homes are efficiently trained to become useful tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, gardeners, and to follow other peaceful vocations on shore; while all the girls are specially trained for domestic service. The abnormal demand for domestic servants results in the Society being inundated with applications, from distracted housewives who cannot get servants for love or money.

It is no exaggeration to say that only about one in thirty of the ladies who apply can be supplied with a servant from the Society's Homes. We mention this to prevent disappointment on the part of any of our readers who may think of applying.

In many parts of the country, throughout the year, the excellent work of the charity is made known by Mr. Henry G. Copeland, the finance and deputation secretary, who gives capital limelight lectures concerning the Homes and training ships.

Every month eight thousand copies of the Society's illustrated periodical, entitled Our Log Book, are issued, the circulation of which assists materially in making known the work of the institution. It is to be hoped that the Christian public will long continue to support so genuine and useful a work as these National Refuges.

Evangelizing English Roman Catholics.

PROTESTANT REFORMATION SOCIETY.

THE first annual report of this Society was issued in 1828. It declared that "if it be the truth that the Church of Rome has substituted the daily sacrifice of the Mass for the once perfected sacrifice of the Cross; if it be the truth that she has joined to the mediatorship of Him who was alone in the redemption, and claims to be alone in the advocacy of His Church, the office of other mediators and other intercessors—and, above all, if it be a truth that she would offer the 'beggarly elements' of human merits and human mortifications in the room of the perfect and spotless righteousness of the immaculate Lamb of God—she has fundamentally and practically subverted the doctrine of the Atonement, and it is the duty of every believer in revelation to lift his unqualified protest against her existence. The exposure of error in such a Church becomes a Christian and imperative duty, and proselytism from her faith should be the avowed, the conscientious employment, of as many as believe that her doctrines are opposed to the life-giving Gospel of the Son of God."

Rome is unchanged and unchangeable. The need for instructing our people in the principles of the Reformation and for carrying on missionary work among her adherents in this country continues to lay a solemn duty upon English Protestants.

In this present year, Englishmen are face to face with the sad results of the insidious Oxford Movement. The object of "maintaining the religious principles of the Reformation" has become increasingly more important, and still, as year after year rolls by, becomes more and more a pressing necessity.

What is being done? This Society expends nearly the whole of its income upon living agents, who are directly engaged in the work. Its clerical and general superintendent is the Rev. C. H. H. Wright, D.D., PhD., labours unceasingly by speech and pen in all parts of the country. Besides his frequent sermons and lectures to the general public, Dr. Wright's academical and literary standing specially qualifies him to influence the Universities and Theological Colleges, and these important centres are visited as frequently as possible.

The Secretary, Mr. Walter A. Limbrick, lectures and gives addresses of a popular character, with and without the lantern, and, in the course of every year, visits a large number of parishes in many dioceses. The Rev. C. J. Casher, B.D. (Oxon), District Secretary for Oxford, does important work in that ancient centre of learning, as also Miss Emma M. D. Miller, Mission Secretary for Devon and Cornwall.

In all, only twelve clerical and lay missionaries, in addition to the office staff, are available for the great work undertaken by the Society. These missionaries have all been placed in important centres, and are now at work in South-East London, Manchester, Liverpool, Bristol, Oxford, Weston-super-Mare, Hastings and St. Leonards, Leamington, Tunbridge Wells and Mayfield, Devon and Cornwall, Essex, and West Kent. There is urgent need for similar mission work being immediately undertaken in such centres as East and North London, Kensington, Brompton, Forest Gate and Ilford, Nottingham, Low Moor and Cleator Moor, Birmingham, Leicester, Brighton, Wigan, Cardiff, and other places, but no funds are at present available.

"THE PROTESTANT DICTIONARY."

The committee have also decided to issue, under the above title, a work which is likely to prove of the highest importance in the religious condition of the country at large. The work is intended to embrace, within a compass of 800 pp. royal 8vo., all the various subjects connected with the Romish and Ritualistic controversies. It is to be issued in the form of a dictionary, which is to be published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, and it is expected that the work will be ready by December, 1903.

The greatest care will be exercised that the information imparted shall be accurate, scholarly, and up-to-date, and presented, as far as possible, in a concise, clear, and useful manner, and free from all bitterness of expression.

The editors are Rev. C. H. H. Wright, D.D., M.A., Ph.D., and Rev. Charles Neil, M.A., and the staff of writers, which numbers over forty persons, includes Rev. Canon W. H. M. H. Aitken, M.A. Rev. C. J. Casher, B.D., Rev. Prof. Henry Cowan, D.D., Rev. N. Dimock, M.A., Rev. A. W. Greenup, M.A., Rev. F. J. Hamilton, D.D., Rev. Prof. John Herkless, D.D., Rev. Charles Hole, B.A., Rev. Principal T. M. Lindsay, D.D., the Very Rev. the Dean of Norwich, Rev. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth, M.A., D.Litt., Rev. H. J. R. Marston, M.A., Rev. Canon Frederick Meyrick, M.A., the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Durham, Rev. Prof. Thomas Nicol, D.D., Rev. Prof. James Orr, D.D., Rev. George Salmon, D.D., Hon. D.C.L., Oxon., Hon. LL.D. Camb., &c., F.R.S., Provost of Trinity College Dublin, J. T. Tomlinson, Esq., Rev. Preb. Henry Wace, D.D., Walter Walsh, Esq., and Benj. Whitehead, Esq., B.A., barrister-at-law.

Although Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have undertaken the work, the production of such a book and the purchase of 3,000 copies will entail heavy outlay on the funds of the Protestant Reformation Society. Help is, therefore, urgently needed in order to ensure the appearance of the work at the date promised, and the Society earnestly ask those who feel the importance of the undertaking, and who desire to see such a work published which will be suitable alike for Christian scholars and workers, at a time of such grave controversy as the present—to remember the undertaking in their prayers, to mention it in the circles in which they move, and, according to their ability, to give such help as they are able.

Conference on Soul-Winning. — Three-days' meetings have been held in Eastbourne dealing with the subject of soul-winning, at which Mr. Thos. Hogben (founder of the One by One Working Band) and Mr. Paget Wilkes were the chief speakers. The gatherings were full of power, and proved a time of rich blessing to many of God's children from various churches. The necessity of working according to God's plan was pressed home. It was, when all was done according to the pattern given to Moses in the mount that the glory filled the tabernacle. Intercessory prayer, united with individual effort in the power of the Spirit, was shown to be God's plan for soul-winning. At the close of the last meeting there was a time of waiting upon God, in the quiet of which His voice was heard. Some have been stirred up to follow this plan, and have joined the One by One Band, and a local centre has been formed.

Victims of a Cruel Fraud.

THE "LIBERATOR" RELIEF FUND.

By Rev. STOCKWELL WATTS.

SOME few months since a wealthy lady requested my assistance in sending a parcel of clothing to a suffering family described in one of my appeals. She added, "I shall not apologize for thus troubling you, because you have given yourself to care for these poor victims of a cruel fraud. You are doing a great work, and will presently have a great reward."

I replied: "Dear Madam, I will gladly do as you request, because, whilst I believe in the recompense 'at the resurrection of the just,' and in an eternal reward for the faithful followers of Christ, I have, in spirit and in kind, already experienced my best and greatest reward in the unspeakable joy I have found in being the privileged instrument of rendering some assistance to the Lord's afflicted people. In a very true sense I can say with the poet—

The reward is in the doing,
And the rapture of pursuing
Is the prize."

I am aware that a few friends have thought this Fund should have been finished some time since, at least when our rough original estimate of its needs came to be realized. But that was clearly because they didn't know the facts. If they will kindly take the trouble to read this brief article through, I feel sure they will quickly arrive at another conclusion.

It was impossible to forecast the actual requirements of the Fund. Much has been accomplished. That more than 2,800 destitute cases have received assistance, and that nearly 1,000 of these who were seventy years of age and upwards have been made annuitants and receive their half-yearly grants as long as they live and are in need, is indeed something to be devoutly thankful for. But the simple fact that during the past twelve months more than fifty new cases have applied for help, most of them as pitiable as any that had been previously dealt with, is sufficient to show that the Fund cannot yet be closed. Moreover, a careful re-survey of the many hundreds of cases that still remain upon our books, has convinced my committee that much still remains to be done if we would truly carry out its original beneficent purpose.

A PAINFUL OUTLOOK.

There are now 3,170 cases registered, of whom no fewer than 633 have passed to their eternal rest since the Fund was started. Of the survivors there are still 659 annuitants, seventy years of age and upwards, whose half-yearly grant is assured to them, but in many cases is felt to be miserably insufficient. Much better than nothing, undoubtedly! But how meagre the help has been, compared with the heavy loss sustained, is seen in our last report, which shows that the average of the 2,161 grants made during the year was less than £3 10s. apiece, or £7 a year, whilst many had been accustomed to receive £25, £50, and in some cases more than £100 per annum in the way of interest from the various companies of the Balfour group.

Then there are over 350 cases that are sixty years of age and under seventy, most of them greatly afflicted, and needing the help quite as much as the annuitants, but who have yet to be provided for.

Then again during the year that is just closing (1902) my Committee have been constrained to give temporary assistance to nearly 200 cases under 60 years of age—90 per cent. of whom are widows or spinsters, and at least half of whom are confirmed invalids—who must continue to be a charge upon the Fund as long as it exists.

From the foregoing it is, I think, clearly apparent that another ten or twenty thousand pounds are urgently needed to complete this Good Samaritan effort.

Simply premising further, that every case, before receiving help, is accredited by two reliable references, I feel that I cannot do better than let some of the sufferers tell their own pathetic story.

TYPICAL NEW CASES.

An ex-corn-store keeper (age 65, Church of England), who lost £300 in the "Liberator" Building Society, and had only received one quarter's dividend when the crash came. His rector writes:—

I have known applicant for more than ten years, and can testify to the perfect respectability of his character.

He has worked for thirty-five years at the Corn Stores, which are now given up, and he is so afflicted with rheumatic gout that he is unable to obtain another situation. His wife is seventy-three years of age and nearly blind.

An architectural draughtsman (age sixty, Congregational), who lost all his savings in one of the Balfour group of companies, was at the time of the "Liberator" crash employed in the City, but soon after lost his situation through the death of his employers, and has ever since had a hard struggle to live, through affliction and his constant failure to obtain more than occasional work.

But his pathetic story will be best told in his own language. He writes:—

I was an unfortunate shareholder in the London and General Bank. Further, I had made a provision for my old age by insuring my life for £200, payable at the age of sixty-five; but not being able to pay the premium through losing my savings, I was obliged to let my policy lapse, and therefore lost my money there.

I am now in the utmost distress, with daily expectation of being turned into the streets, through not being able to pay my rent. I reluctantly make this urgent appeal, which distress compels me to do, to the "Liberator" Relief Committee, in the hope they may be able to assist me with a few pounds to enable me to keep a shelter over my head.

I am sixty years of age, and unable through failing eyesight to follow my profession of architectural draughtsman.

I have had to pawn and sell nearly everything I possess, to obtain food from day to day for myself and wife.

His reference writes, November 11, 1902:—

He has not yet applied for parish relief, and he wants, if possible, to be saved this pain.

He is in a most distressing condition, having lived on bread only for days. I believe him to be deserving of the very best you can do for him.

A domestic servant (age sixty-nine, Baptist), who since her husband's death four years since has struggled for a bare subsistence by letting lodgings, but whose health has now entirely failed, writes:—

Will you kindly place this letter before the relief committee. My husband had £90 invested in the "Liberator" Building Society, and since his death I have maintained myself by taking lodgers. Now I am in my seventieth year, and being unable to continue this work, am compelled to ask for help.

My husband's small income died with him, and I have no relations able to assist me, or any children. If it is possible to grant me anything I shall be very grateful, however small the amount. Reference is kindly permitted to Mrs. H. P., in whose family I lived for twenty-four years, and also to the Rev. H. S., "The Manse," both of whom can testify to the effort I have made to maintain myself without asking for help.

"A most deserving case," adds her sympathizing pastor.

A poor widow (age forty-six, Baptist), with six young children dependent upon her, who didn't apply for help till the death of her husband, who lost all his savings, writes November, 1902:—

Dear Sir,—I am writing to you to ask you if you can help me, for I am brought quite to a standstill. I would not appeal to you if I was not in real need. I have six little children, all under eleven years old, who, of course, cannot earn a penny, and it takes me all my time to see after them, so that I cannot earn myself, and I don't know how to get food and clothes and shoes sufficient for them this winter. And as your aim is to help them that really need, I am quite sure that there are not many need it more than I do. If you could come and see my dear children, I am sure you could not deny my request. If you could only send me 10s. it would mean shoes for my dear children.

I do trust and pray that you will not turn a deaf ear to my cry. It is so hard to see my dear children want when that which might have bought them what they need was lost in that "Liberator." Do please hear, answer, and help.

A Manifold Work.

THE RAGGED SCHOOL UNION.

THE Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society remains true to the ideals of its best-known promoter and first president. The good and great Lord Shaftesbury saw in ragged schools not merely an opportunity to teach the three R's, but channels along which the Word of God might flow with such volume and force as to change the hearts and colour the lives of sinful humanity.

The trend of history, the gradual absorption by the State of the function of secular teachers, have, except in a few remaining institutions, made ragged schools direct mission agencies. Evening schools and technical classes are held in some buildings, but in the 150 missions and schools in the metropolis affiliated to the Union, the Sunday class, the evangelistic service, the mothers' meeting, the Christian Endeavour Society, are the direct methods by which, under God's blessing, it is sought to uplift the spiritual well-being of the dwellers in their crowded neighbourhoods.

The Ragged School Union is far from having accomplished its purpose. The results of each census of Sunday attendance now being taken show that there is greater and deeper need than ever for special attention being paid to those classes into which, by poverty and misery, fall hundreds and thousands of men and women who in their youth were Sunday scholars.

Not only does the Gospel save for eternity, but it helps to make life sweeter, happier, and more civilized in this world of Time. The drunkard rescued from the public-house, the immoral from their surroundings, the blasphemer and Sabbath breaker from their environment, grow in moral stature and in useful citizenship as they grow in grace. Every sovereign expended in preventive and remedial effort averts great loss to the community, and bestows blessing on the individual.

Recognition of this fact has led the Council of the Ragged School Union last winter and this to pursue special lines of work among "drift" children—the boys and girls outside even Sunday-schools and missions. With some reluctance to increase expenditure, but with the conviction that the object needs systematic and concentrated effort, the Council has recently appointed twelve additional agents, who are holding weekly meetings, and by the aid of Gospel lantern lectures attracting and interesting children of the most neglected classes.

In visiting and moving among them, both special agents and the thousands of voluntary teachers, become familiar with the distress which every winter brings specially to the front. It is a sad sight, on entering some of the schools, to witness pinched faces and shoeless feet, and garments with but the smallest pretensions to warmth. Happily, some, but only a comparative few, can be aided from the stores of the Barefoot Mission. Faster than parcels of clothing—old and new—are received from friends, they are being called for by workers in all parts of our great city. But the greatest need is that of boots and shoes. They are bestowed by way of loan-gift to ensure their being preserved, but we need funds to purchase them.

In the multifarious demands which the winter season, and Christmas especially, makes upon the loving charity of our Lord's followers, there is some satisfaction in reflecting that the Ragged School Union and Shaftesbury Society is one of national and established reputation, including subscribers from His Majesty the King down to the humblest maid-servant; and that its ever-extending usefulness is a fitting test of the appreciation in which it is held.

Surgical aid and holiday homes for cripples, children's breakfasts, soup kitchens, goose clubs, the clothing mission, and other agencies go hand-in-hand with the preaching and teaching of the Gospel. So extensive is the amount of voluntary co-operation that nine-tenths of all moneys received directly support the agencies enumerated, and concerning these the monthly magazine, In His Name, gives full information. The secretary is Mr. John Kirk, 32, John Street, Theobalds Road, London, W.C.

Sunshine and Shadow.

THE "BRIDGE OF HOPE."

SO quickly has the busy year flown, it seems difficult to realize that we are almost within sound of the Christmas chimes once more! In our work we have had sunshine and shadow, but there is no day of all the year when we have not had cause for thanksgiving. At this season we turn with happy confidence to the large circle of friends "whose most Christian name is Help," and ask them, as in the past, so once again to remember us very specially at this time of "peace and goodwill."

Our Homes are all full; there is not a bed without its occupant—every one with her own pathetic history. The applications have been so constant—I mean even unusually so—that I have been looking over the names of those in the Homes to see if any could be sent to their own friends to make room for others. But every face reminds me of the sad story of the little life, and there is not one with whom I could part.

SPECIMEN CASES.

A lady has just brought a little girl, pleading that we would take her in. She is a bright child, but the surroundings of her life have been such that I could not give them here. She has been utterly neglected by a drunken mother, and was in the gravest moral danger. How could we send her back to such a home?

Another worker brought an older girl from an equally wretched home. She had simply run wild, and was beyond control. The worker expressed a fear that she would not bear the restraint, but it was the only hope of saving her from the terrible East End streets. A more deplorable object for a girl of sixteen could scarcely be found. At first she was a very disturbing element, and we almost despaired of ever teaching her to modulate her shrill voice. But only a few weeks have elapsed, and no girl in the home is making more resolute efforts at self-control. One by one the rough, wild habits are being dropped, and at our simple services there is no face more intently thoughtful. To her the "old, old story" is new, and first germs of a new life are springing up in this young heart, hitherto accustomed only to the ribald songs of the street, where she was a match for the roughest boy.

These are just ordinary specimens of the children and girls we take, and for whom we ask the help of all our friends. I feel I can never write to THE CHRISTIAN without thanking its readers for their unfailing helpfulness.

I must again draw attention to the very altered surroundings of the Home, in consequence of the

EVER-INCREASING JEWISH POPULATION.

Perhaps it is a subject not sufficiently realized except by those who live in East London. One of my workers was giving me a striking illustration of this fact. It is her practice to distribute suitable tracts and booklets in the poor streets round about us on Sunday afternoons.

"But," she said, "I have found it is almost useless going into the streets when the public houses are open, because then there are only crowds of foreigners walking about, who can neither read English nor understand if I speak to them. So I go into all the public-houses, where I find no Jews, but the bars are full of our own people, English men and women. They are nearly always willing to take the books, and will listen to me."

Perhaps few who are living in the country, or even in suburban homes, can imagine the sad picture; but the terrible fact remains, and unless every Christian man and woman lays to heart the condition of such neighbourhoods, and sees the necessity for individual and combined effort to fight the common foe of drink, there must inevitably be an appalling future for our country.

Toilers of the Sea.

ROYAL MISSION TO DEEP SEA FISHERMEN.

NO one can read the narratives in the New Testament relating the stirring episodes in our Saviour's life and work among the fishermen on the Galilean Lake, or study the character and work of the apostle Peter—himself a fisherman—without feeling the debt we are under to this hardy pioneer of the Gospel, the beautiful Epistles he has left to the Church for all time being themselves a priceless legacy.

But since the days when Peter went fishing on the placid waters of the Lake, the fishing industry has grown to enormous dimensions, and claims the attentions and labours of a large number of men and boys in our own country, who in themselves form a class separate and distinct from the rest of the community.

As the writer of this article once heard a fisherman remark on board a trawler in the North Sea, "There were no steam trawls in Peter's day, sir." The speaker had no wish to be in any sense profane, but was simply reiterating an apparent and obvious contrast which exists between ancient and modern methods of fish-catching.

But these changes have not, in any marked degree, altered the main characteristics of of toilers. Impulsive, generous, and yet conservative in disposition, the modern fishermen still stand in need of a friendly hand to guide them, and a willing heart to help them, in their peculiar circumstances.

In the case of the New Testament story, whose chief figure is Peter, the record deals with a solitary boat; but to-day they are dotted in fleets over a great part of the North Sea, and represent a commonwealth of some thousands of men and boys.

Now one of the problems of the age is how to get the men to church; but the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen has solved the problem by reversing the order, and has very wisely taken the Gospel and the church to the men.

In fair weather and foul, the Mission steamer—herself a trawler—attends to the spiritual, moral, physical, and intellectual needs of probably the hardiest community to be found in the population of these islands; and as if in discharge (shall we say?) of the debt which Christendom owes to the staunch but impulsive Apostle, the vessels of the Mission fleet stand by to help the deep-sea fishermen.

A GLANCE AT THE STATISTICS

of this Society will reveal to even the casual reader the nature and extent of their enterprise. The Society has institutes in North Shields, Grimsby, Yarmouth, Aberdeen, Brixham, Milford Haven, &c., and carries on a valuable work among the cod fishers engaged on the Newfoundland Banks, and on the cold inhospitable shores of Labrador; but, perhaps, its most extensive operations are those which are prosecuted in the North Sea.

During the year 1901 no less than 48 tons 5cwt. 2qrs. and 20lb. of magazines, books, and tracts were distributed. In addition to this, 3,450 missionary visits were paid, and the surgeons treated 6,372 patients, many of whom were detained for a period in the hospital, which forms part of the equipment of the Mission vessels. The missioners held 2,300 religious services, and registered 615 temperance pledges, and this forms but a portion of the work accomplished in one year on the North Sea alone.

The most brilliant imagination could not picture the condition of a patient with a broken limb before the advent of the Mission vessel. Racked with pain consequent upon the rolling of the ship, and with all sorts of complications affecting the patient through lack of skilled treatment, his state was indeed deplorable; but to-day he is transferred to the Alpha, Queen Alexandra, or Joseph and Sarah Miles, and placed in a cot, which, being poised on gimbals, retains its equipoise, besides having the invaluable attention of a qualified surgeon, provided with the most up-to-date appliances.

ERNEST RICHARDS.

Deformed and Transformed.

WATERCRESS AND FLOWER GIRLS' MISSION.

WHEN I called, it was by appointment. My destination was an out-of-the-way street in a depressing, overcrowded, grimy neighbourhood; a neighbourhood avoided by the rich, and monopolized by the poor; one of those streets, and one of those neighbourhoods which get on the nerves and sadden the heart; a district given over to gloom, and sadly needing such an oasis of brightness and hopefulness as I was about to visit.

The gloom was deepened by a raw choking fog, and the glaring lights of the enormous gin-palaces made the surrounding darkness all the more noticeable. "A night for one's own home and fireside," I muttered, as I neared the house where I was to meet my friend, Flo—Flo, the deformed—and her friend, Mr. Groom, the transformer.

"RESCUED FROM WRETCHEDNESS."

I was shown at once into his office, a plain unpretentious apartment on the first floor, and waited but a few moments before the girl entered. She still used her crutch, as when I saw her last, but she did not wear the hunted look, the tattered clothing, the helpless, hopeless expression so painfully associated in my mind with all previous thought of her. She would be a cripple all her life, but the old terrors had gone, as I hope and believe, for ever. The cruelty of her drunken father, the poverty of her wretched "home," had been exchanged for the Christian kindness of the friends now about her, with sufficiency of food and clothing, and the suitable, interesting employment.

No words on her part were needed to assure me that I had done well when, a few weeks previously, I brought her under Mr. Groom's notice, with a request readily granted that he would give her his care and attention.

Naturally, I expressed a wish to see something of the new conditions under which she lived, and, as I went over the building, I learned that she was but one of a company of a hundred girls who had been rescued from similar wretchedness. She and the others were all being

TRAINED TO EARN THEIR OWN LIVING.

"You see," said Mr. Groom, "one of the first things we have to do is to persuade the poor things that they are not so absolutely helpless after all. They have so often heard themselves referred to, pityingly or contemptuously, as "helpless cripples," that really many of them have accepted the verdict as ultimate and beyond all dispute. We reverse the verdict, set them to work making artificial flowers, and prove to them that they are able to take their places in the great army of wage-earners. They begin to lift up their heads, and to cultivate a hope and cheerfulness they have never known before."

Very pretty and tasteful is the work these girls turn out, after training; and the benefit they derive is immense. Mr. Groom has now laboured many years among the poor, but I think no department of his work commends itself more readily to the sympathy and support of the charitable than this on behalf of crippled and afflicted girls, to whom domestic service is a physical impossibility.

In pleading, as I do, for urgently-needed funds, which should be sent to Mr. Groom, at 8, Sekforde Street, Clerkenwell, London, E.C., or to the office of THE CHRISTIAN, I venture to assert, with confidence, that, in connection with the Flower Girls' Mission, one of the most useful and commendable forms of Christian philanthropy is being conducted, with admirable results, in a manner characterised by the absence of parade, and by the presence of a most tender solicitude, for both the spiritual and temporal welfare of one of the most needy classes in our midst—the crippled girls of the United Kingdom.

The Wickliffe Preachers.

PROTESTANT TRUTH SOCIETY.

OF the many Protestant Societies labouring for Reformation principles, none are more deserving of the support of Christian people than the Protestant Truth Society and the Kensit Wickliffe Preachers. Founded by the late John Kensit, in 1898, these preachers have carried the Gospel message into over 800 English towns, and thousands of our dark priest-ridden parishes, and have addressed approximately 1,203,000 persons.

Many of our rural towns and villages, where their work chiefly lies, are in a pitiable spiritual condition, owing to the spread of ritualistic practices, and many testimonies of conversion and blessing have followed the visits of these itinerant Protestant evangelists. The work is carried on under varying circumstances, sometimes a hall is hired, or a mission, school-room, or barn, is placed at their disposal, and when all buildings are closed they resort to the open air for their services. All classes are reached, high and low, rich and poor, mechanics and artizans, business-men and the labouring classes. They work through many agencies, by pulpit and Press, Sunday-school and Bible class, children's lantern services and working-men's meetings, and great evangelistic services for the masses.

OPPOSITION AROUSED.

They have had more than their share of opposition, and the death of Mr. John Kensit, at the hands of a brutal mob, and the high-handed imprisonment of his son are fresh in the memory of our readers. Like their Lord and His Apostles the preachers also have had to face the wrath of man, and frequently have been stoned, assaulted, maltreated, persecuted, prosecuted, and cast into prison for "the truth as it is in Jesus," but have always come out "more than conquerors," being, as they are, men of faith and prayer.

The preachers are all converted young men who have to pass an examination in spiritual truths, and show a zeal for the Lord of Hosts, after which they are sent forth in bands of five, and tour the country to preach the Word and contend for the faith. There are at the present time three such companies working in different directions, and holding over forty services weekly. Since the martyrdom of their beloved founder, several have been formulated by Mr. J. A. Kensit, and to perpetuate his work, a fund for the foundation and endowment of a suitable Training Home for the Wickliffe Preachers has been opened.

The country has been mapped out, and a band of preachers has been allotted to each district, an extension which will be carried into effect after a great prayer meeting and send off in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C., on January 1 next, at which Rev. F. S. Webster has undertaken to give a short address.

The Training-Home scheme is specially deserving of support, as a thorough and effective training of his Wickliffe preachers would be the most fitting memorial of their founder's work. The completion of the Extension Scheme to the desired number of 100 preachers, and the erection of the "John Kensit Memorial Training Home," would require the sum of £10,000, which should easily be raised among the Christian public.

Every lover of an open Bible and of Gospel truth may fairly be asked to help this aggressive movement which has done more than any other organization under God, to arouse the Protestants of England and arrest the onward march of Ritualism and Sacerdotalism. Address Mr. John Alfred Kensit, 18, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Leaflets explanatory of the extension scheme and collecting forms will be sent on application.

Open-Air Mission for Ireland.

THE following extracts from a recent report of one of the most active workers in connection with the "Open-Air Mission for Ireland" will, I feel, interest the readers of The Christian:—

In over forty towns during the past season, 186 meetings were held, some of them in the down-pouring rain, where men and women stood listening eagerly in their sodden clothes; some in sunshine, when listening crowds constrained the preachers to continue for two, and in some cases, even three hours. The accompanying photograph gives some idea of such a meeting in the town of C——. On the left hand may be seen a stump orator, who always collects a goodly number around him. This man's violent language regarding the preachers generally drives his auditors to join the company who are hearing of Him who came to give "peace on earth" and to promote goodwill among men. Again and again have we seen this orator sit down in his cart for lack of listeners; I heard him cry, "Oh, if the Catholics in that crowd would only close around me what a congregation I would have!" Moreover, he has pleaded with the people to forsake the Gospel preachers and either come round him or go right away. As a rule, however, as the photograph shows, they remain—as attentive hearers of the "old, old story" proclaimed from the steps of the ancient Market Cross, and the moistening of many eyes shows that the Word has power to move the hearts of men.

GATHERING THE CROWD IN IRELAND.

"And you had a meeting without disturbance?" said an astonished Christian worker, "and on a fair day, too! Well, at first I could hardly believe my ears, but I am so glad." This was said to us in August concerning a meeting held in Ballyshannon. On that bright summer day the place sang with the glad tidings of salvation.

"You will be swept into the sea if you attempt it," said a resident, when we spoke of our intention to hold meetings on the beach at Bundoran. A local magistrate also expressed his conviction that it would lead to a breach of the peace. But, despite these discouragements, we went forth, and for a full month on Sunday afternoons we had large and orderly gatherings.

Last fair day we were again in the town of R——. In days gone by, when there, it often seemed as if hell were let loose. Then no man would receive us into his house; but now all is changed. We preached while we had strength on the fair day to a large audience in the market place, and were able afterwards to go into the hotel for luncheon and rest. When we contrast the cordiality with which we are now received with the hostility that we encountered formerly, we can only exclaim, "What hath God wrought!"

"I never thought I would live to see such a day in Loughrea," said a gentleman after one of our meetings in that town. In the great October sheep fair we were quickly surrounded by hundreds of men, carrying formidable-looking sheep crooks, and there was not a policeman present when we began. Our Connaught peasantry admire the courage which the Gospel inspires.

At the close of a meeting in July an old man came to us and said, "Your labour this day has not been in vain. I am an old man and a great sinner; but I never felt before as I do to-day. From henceforth I will serve the Lord." Before we left that day two others told us that while we were preaching they surrendered to Christ; while another begged us to go to his town to preach the Gospel there also.

Artillery Lane Mission

SPITALFIELDS, the district of East London which was once the home of the immigrant Huguenot weavers, has fallen on evil days. It contains, perhaps, more squalid lodging-houses than any other part of the metropolis, and a visit to its dismal courts and alleys is to endure sights and odours that are repulsive in the extreme.

Amid these sordid surroundings Gospel work has for many years been carried on by friends at the Artillery Lane Mission. On Lord's Day evenings five of the lodging-houses are visited by Mr. C. H. Barrick, the esteemed secretary, and a band of devoted workers from Clapton Hall, Cholmondely Hall, and other centres. The Word is earnestly proclaimed and listened to.

Two branches of the work are particularly interesting. The first is the systematic visitation by the secretary, who is familiar with all the nooks and corners of this terrible neighbourhood; his labours have been blessed to some of the most depraved. Another outstanding feature is the Gospel meeting for women held on Wednesday afternoons, when the hall, always densely crowded, presents a remarkable scene. The audience includes the very poorest of women, not a few of whom are unable night by night to raise the money necessary to gain admission to the cheapest shelter, and who accordingly sleep in doorways, stables, or any corner where they can huddle away from notice. Some appear confirmed in habits of depravity, others, who have obviously striven to make themselves as presentable as possible, are clean, if ragged, but all this weird, motley throng of London's miserables quietly listen to the addresses of the lady speakers, who tell forth the story of redeeming love. Individual cases are perseveringly dealt with by Mrs. Barrick, and it is believed that some of these poor creatures have found the way of life.

The hon. treasurer is Mr. W. B. Stevens, 22, Durley Road, Stamford Hill, N.

A Christian Prince and Princess.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

KING OSCAR II., of Sweden and Norway, has four sons. The second of these, Prince Oscar Charles Augustus Bernadotte, the subject of this sketch, was born November 15, 1859. It is said that he is his father's favourite son. At an early age he was sent to a large, private school, where he was brought under strong Christian influences, but was not then converted. On completing his college course, he attended lectures at the Upsala University, and at the conclusion of his studies became an officer in the Royal Navy. He has now passed through the different degrees, and become an Admiral.

In 1884 he made a journey round the world as an officer in a Swedish man-of-war; and was always interested to look in on the Young Men's Christian Associations and various missionaries' operations at any harbour in which his vessel might be anchored. But though the spiritual impressions, which he had received through his pious mother, the Queen of Sweden and Norway (herself converted through Lord Radstock), never wholly faded from his mind, yet he had not as yet experienced a real conversion. This came shortly after his return. He was deeply affected by a serious illness, which compelled him to go for treatment to a celebrated "massage" doctor at Amsterdam, where it happened that the Crown Princess of Sweden and Norway was staying at the same time, attended by her charming maid of honour, Miss Ebba Munck. Prince Oscar became deeply attached to her, and there can be no doubt that from their first acquaintance he was greatly influenced by her religious earnestness.

Miss Munck was descended from an old and noble family, and on the death of her father became connected with the Swedish Court. Here she was sought in marriage by one of the royal equerries, but on the eve of celebrating their nuptials, she discovered that he was unworthy of her affection. She broke off the engagement, resigned her position at Court, and came to Bournemouth, to the house of the Countess Cairns, where she found Christ as her Saviour. On her return to Sweden, she again became attached to the Court, and met Prince Oscar at Amsterdam.

Great opposition was manifested towards this attachment. According to Swedish law, a Prince must resign his claim to the throne, if he wishes to marry a subject. But Prince Oscar was prepared for this, and to brave the social odium which his marriage involved. He renounced also his right to any allowance from the Diet, and felt well repaid for all his sacrifices in at last receiving permission from the King to marry the lady of his choice. Now that I know the Princess for myself, I confess that I do not think that the Prince is to be commiserated—in her he has what diadems and thrones cannot give. She is one of the sweetest, noblest women I have ever met.

It is lovely to be in their home. Of course, it is not my intention to unveil its secrets; but two scenes linger with me which I can never forget; first, the family prayers in the morning when the Prince and Princess pray, and are followed by one or two of their servants; and secondly, the games that we had with their five dear children on the night of our return from the Södertilge Conference. These suited me exactly, who always long for one Christmas evening a month.

The Prince and Princess live in a comfortable and spacious house near the beautiful public park, and everything is fitly ordered for their rank; but it is a truly Christian home. There is no restraint nor gloom; on the contrary, the house often rings with merry laughter. On Sunday morning the whole family goes to Sunday-school at 8.45, the Prince and Princess to take classes, and the children to be taught.

It is impossible to be with this godly and noble pair without being struck with their love for souls. The Prince often visits the prisoners in the gaols, and told me of one whom he visited for a whole year, month after month, till he was converted. He is the chairman of the National Council of the Swedish Y.M.C.A., and keenly interested in young men. He and I stayed at the after-meeting till nearly eleven on two successive nights, dealing with young men and women, who were anxious about their souls. On one occasion, in my presence, he most faithfully and earnestly dealt with two young women, who seemed to be taking the first steps in the downward path. The Princess and he are always thinking of others. He seemed unconsciously to sum up his life when he said to me, as an explanation for taking trouble on my behalf, "I live to serve."

The Lapps are objects of special interest in that princely home. The family will sometimes spend the whole summer in the district through which these nomad tribes roam, sowing the Gospel seed. As the result of their labours there has been quite a revival among these poor people. The Prince and Princess, with their children, are contemplating a visit to those northern regions about New Year's Day, and I hardly know whether the children are more anticipating the enjoyments of sledging and snow-shoes, than the parents are of telling of Jesus to neglected souls.

What struck me as much as anything during my happy visits on two occasions to these dear friends, was that though they associate with all sorts and conditions of men and women with frank Christian openness, treating them as one in Christ, yet no one ever manifests towards them the slightest undue familiarity. The same honour and respect which would be shown to the king himself is invariably shown to them. Wherever I have gone, their names are spoken of with love and honour, and they have won especial esteem by the way in which they presided, in the king's name, at the Palace in Christiania, over the recent meetings of the world's Y.M.C.A.

What would not the world be, if only such as these were more constantly found among its royalties and rulers? May God long spare them to each other, to their country, and to the world; and may their opportunities widen with the years!

PRINCESS BERNADOTTE.

"Meet for the Master's Use."—When one is thirsty, it matters little whether the water is offered in a common earthen cup or in a golden pitcher. When one is very hungry and you carry him bread, he does not care whether you take it on a silver plate or on a wooden tray. So the grace of Christ may be carried just as well in the heart of a plain fisherman as in that of a learned rabbi; but the vessel must be clean. Christ will not send the blessing of eternal life to lost men through unholy lives. He will not honour us by putting us in trust with the Gospel if our own hearts are unclean and impure.—J. R. Miller.

A Harbour of Refuge.

FIELD LANE REFUGES AND RAGGED SCHOOLS.

THE need of such Christ-like work as is carried on through these Institutions, is only too patent. Sixty years ago the work began with a ragged-school only, but has now developed into Refuges for the Homeless Poor, Crèche, Boys' and Girls' Industrial Homes, Work among Cripples, Holiday Home, and other kindred institutions.

The writer's first introduction to the Night Refuge was as follows:—A poor man passing through the City was knocked down by a reckless driver, and left on the roadside, bruised and bewildered. He was picked up by the bystanders, questioned, and advised. The kind offices of the policeman had been declined, and the curiosity of the crowd had exhausted itself, and still we lingered, wondering what we could do to help him further. Presently a dirty little urchin seemed to realize the situation, and called out, "Take him to Field Lane Refuge, guv'nor." Glad of any suggestion to relieve the helplessness of the situation, we led the poor old man thither. Arriving there, we came face to face with a group of forlorn men and women—cold, hungry, and dejected—waiting for the Refuge to open.

The stranger was admitted with the rest, and shared with them their simple meal and cleanly lodging. Through the intervention of some friends, he was afterwards aided in the recovery of his property, which was valued at some hundreds of pounds.

My next visit to Field Lane was to address the Band of Hope. Here I found some hundreds of city children, with a thousandfold of energy and tenthousandfold of voice power, thronging the meeting. But they were easily reduced to order, and when once interested gave intelligent attention to the address. In this way, week by week, hundreds of young lives learn the advantages of total abstinence—surely a much-needed lesson, seeing the intimate contact they have with drinking habits, both in the streets, and, alas! too often in their own homes.

THE RAGGED CHURCH.

Every Sunday morning witnesses a sad though impressive sight in the Ragged Church. A motley crowd assemble here, some 500 strong. Most of them have spent the night in the refuge or the casual ward, or in the open, and are far too dilapidated to enter any other place of worship. One was impressed with the respectful attention given throughout the simple service, and the thought that such as these were thus brought under the sound of the Gospel gave cause for devout thankfulness. After the service, bread and cocoa were distributed, which seemed to be much appreciated, and, better still, we cannot but believe that He who came "to seek and to save that which was lost," Himself had broken to them the Bread of Life. Eternity alone will reveal the good that has thus been accomplished during these many years, vicious lives abandoned, violent deeds prevented, and some of the audience at least made new creatures in Christ Jesus.

To some this congregation would appear commonplace, dull, ragged and hungry, sometimes cruel and bad, sometimes stupid and mean. How hard to find here any possibility of worth, any promise of goodness! But God bends over them, and to Him this humanity is infinitely precious. To Him it is a pearl of great price, for which He has given all, that He may purchase it for His own possession. He has redeemed it at an unspeakable cost, that He might make it His own peculiar treasure. What wonders, what glories, what possibilities God sees in these poor outcast worshippers in the Ragged Church.

It is somewhat remarkable that children of the class dealt with at Field Lane can be induced to attend a Bible class on a week night, at what would otherwise be their time for recreation or for play. The fact that fifty such meetings are held during the year for infants, juniors, and seniors, respectively, speaks volumes for the way in which the class is conducted. Over 100 young women gather together in this way after their day's work is over. Life's pathway will be dark and slippery for some of them; let us pray that the Word may become a lamp unto their feet and a light unto their path.

Who can tell the amount of good that is done by the Industrial School, where boys are taken from surroundings which would lead them into criminal habits, and placed in these healthy, happy homes, educated, and trained to earn a decent livelihood? They who save a man or woman from such a vortex do much, but prevention is better than cure, and he who saves a child does much more.

There are many other phases of this philanthropic work, such as its care for the tired mother, and the helpless babe while the mother is at work; its Christmas dinners for the homeless, and parcels of good things for the poor and needy. For all this we must refer our readers to the report, or, better still, ask them to visit Field Lane and see for themselves how much is being accomplished there.

Winter is upon us, and the early appearance of Jack Frost has brought increased distress. The daily papers speak of men out of work by stress of weather and poverty and want on all hands. Much has already been done; but the crying needs of every day speak loudly for an increase of liberality on the part of God's stewards. The secretary is Mr. Peregrine Platt, Vine Street, Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

While we look forward to the joy of Christmastide, and lavish gifts upon our loved ones, do not let us forget those who have no friends to minister to their need, not to say comfort or luxury.

Among the Very Poor.

GEORGE YARD MISSION AND SCHOOLS.

OUR many readers interested in George Yard will be thankful to know that the Lord is graciously blessing and prospering this work in its various and numerous undertakings for the welfare of the poor of Whitechapel.

As of old, under the late revered founder, Mr. George Holland, whose chief desire was the glory of Jehovah—so now, "God first!" is and must be the living motto of George Yard, constraining and uniting the workers in the one great object of leading souls to the Lord Jesus Christ. Thanks be to Him for the large number of voluntary workers, both ladies and gentlemen, who come so willingly from all parts of London and the suburbs, to help forward the work at George Yard among both adults and children.

THE INFLUX OF JEWS.

The various and numerous meetings are, under God's good hand, prospering. There is also much encouragement in the work now going forward among the Jews (who are crowding Whitechapel), coming, as they do, in numbers, and listening with deep interest to the glorious Gospel preached in Yiddish.

The mothers' (Tuesday) gatherings are, on account of the numbers attending, divided into two meetings, and we have numerous lady helpers coming regularly to speak to the women words of life, help, sympathy, and comfort.

The Ragged Schools have increased to over 400 little ones, drawn from the poorest of Whitechapel. The parents of some of our children are so poor as to have no settled home, wandering from one lodging-house to another, which are, in some cases, so crowded that the children have to sleep on the stairs. Breakfasts are provided for those who come to school without it. Lately, one child, when he could not learn his lesson, replied, "I've a headache, teacher," and it was with some difficulty elicited from the boy that he had had nothing to eat that morning. It is a glad sight to see the children enjoying a soup dinner this cold, wintry weather. In October last a week's mission for children was held at George Yard by Mr. Dudley Smith, and much definite blessing resulted.

Any visitors wishing to see the Mission or schools would be heartily welcomed by Colonel Hayne, 37, High Street, Whitechapel, E.C.

The Evening of Life.

THE AGED PILGRIMS' FRIEND SOCIETY.

NINETY-FIVE years ago this greatly-needed Society was instituted for the purpose of assisting the aged Christian poor of both sexes, and of every Protestant denomination, who are not under sixty years of age. Like so many other institutions, the Society originated through that revival of the spiritual life of the churches which resulted from the preaching of George Whitefield and other evangelists.

The work may be briefly expressed thus: Founded in 1807, the Society has carried on an undenominational work for God's aged poor from that day to this. Its methods have been tried and proved; and in a simple, safe, and easy way it provides help for life for all its pensioners, and also homes for such of the recipients as need them, the committee striving to give "the maximum of good at the minimum of cost."

The Hon. Mr. Justice Bruce, at a recent meeting, said: "The Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society has stood the test of time, having existed well-nigh a century, so that it may be called an honourable Society. And during this long period, how many sorrows has it softened, how many homes has it gladdened! It has special claims upon our support, because it is engaged in work necessary and urgent, yet apt to be overlooked or forgotten. It is a Christian privilege to minister to God's aged poor, therefore let us endeavour to promote the prosperity of this Institution."

Sixteen hundred pensioners in all parts of the country are upon the books, and upwards of £12,000 per annum are expended in pensions, and £2,000 in maintaining the Homes and the Coal and Benevolent Funds in connection with them. An expenditure of more than £37 daily has therefore to be met, and the ordinary income is inadequate for this.

The pensions bring the recipients across the border line which marks the division between

GRINDING POVERTY AND DECENT COMFORT.

To people in straitened circumstances there is one day in each week the approach of which is viewed with misgiving, and that is rent day, and one is no sooner past than the next looms upon them. What a delicious sense of peace and security fills the minds of the old folk when they become pensioners! No more listening in dread for the step of the rent-collector on the stairs; no more begging for just another day's grace till they can get the money together; no more scraping and pinching till the amount is made up.

With steadfastness of purpose have many of the recipients worked at their several occupations until compelled to desist by increasing infirmities. Letting apartments, needlework, and dressmaking have had to be relinquished by the women, and farm labour, shoemaking, and various trades by the men, and to all these the hand of the Society has been made instrumental in conveying welcome help.

What a pathetic meaning there is in these few words from a candidate in Cornwall:—"My eyesight is failing, and the tailor's work is too dark for me." An aged friend in London was living upon the gradual sale of her goods, when the bestowal of the pension saved her home from complete wreck.

An excellent couple in Wiltshire, both of whom are on the pension list, have been married fifty-seven years, and still live in the cottage which they first occupied fifty-four years ago. Another pensioner has for upwards of twenty years been a Bible-woman; she now waits upon an invalid of very slender means. The most venerable pensioner passed away in January, aged 101, retaining her mental faculties to the end!

These are a few glimpses of the character of those assisted by the Society, and who, but for its aid, would have to seek

SHELTER IN THE WORKHOUSE.

Now, in various parts of the country, they can exercise in their own circles the gracious influence which lives of Christian discipleship always diffuse. The four Homes, situated respectively at Camberwell, Hornsey Rise, Stamford Hill, and Brighton, accommodate 180 of the pensioners, and are open to visitors daily (Sundays excepted).

Such a work must commend itself to every Christian heart. The secretary is Mr. John E. Hazelton, 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

A Beacon Light.

TOWER HAMLETS MISSION.

FEW, indeed, there must be to whom the name of Mr. F. N. Charrington is unfamiliar. Many years have gone by since he inaugurated a work which was destined to exert a far-reaching and ennobling influence upon the lives of down-trodden and despairing men and women, and at the same time prove to be the beacon light which should warn thousands of heedless souls on the verge of moral and spiritual ruin. The Tower Hamlet's Mission, as it exists to-day represents almost every conceivable phase of religious and philanthropic endeavour, and has developed far beyond the expectations of the most sanguine. Mr. Charrington and his devoted workers have in reality year in and year out; for whatever changes may take place, one unchanging fact forces itself upon their notice—the condition of the poverty-stricken by whom they are surrounded. The number of men, women, and children for whom the Mission has to secure even the means of existence, it would appear does not decrease with the passing of time. Firing must be found for shivering families, where the sufferings of little children baffle all description. Boots or shoes for bare feet, clothing for youth and age in rags, money for rent to keep a shelter overhead when either sickness or scarcity of work have made it impossible to satisfy the landlord—these are a few of the innumerable demands made upon the resources of the Mission. Some of the scenes witnessed by the workers who go forth into the haunts of grinding poverty are pitiable in the extreme. The struggles of the poor are known only by those who visit them in their own homes; not until one of their number, who has struggled hard to keep body and soul together, and failed, has at last preferred the canal or river, does the public wake up to ask if it be positively true that in the wealthiest city there are souls pining away, or destroying their lives rather than face another hour of this world's cold comfort.

A touching instance of the economy often practised by the poor came under the notice of one of the workers a few days ago. A poor couple, past middle life, were given tickets for the Lord Mayor's Banquet on November 10. On being asked how they had enjoyed themselves, the woman went on to recount how they had disposed of the food. They ate one of the pound cakes and the apples, and tea at the meeting; that was as much as they could eat. The remaining food was taken home and disposed of in the following manner; the rolls were for dinner next day; one pork pie between them for dinner the day after. That would leave remaining one pork pie and one pound cake. The former was allotted for Sunday's dinner, and the cake for Sunday's tea. In the meantime, if they could not get the remaining necessary meals, they could very well go without.

A UNIQUE RECORD.

In all the named agencies of the Mission, however, the preaching of the Gospel is regarded as the primary factor. On nearly ten thousand consecutive nights the walls of the Great Assembly Hall have echoed to the Gospel message, and weary men and women have crowded in from the streets, and while resting tired bodies, have heard the glad news of a Saviour's love. In numberless instances the souls of these outcasts have been reached, and many prodigals have turned their steps towards the Father's house. In a separate building near the Assembly Hall over 1,500 children gather regularly, and constitute one of the largest Sunday-schools in London. There are also nightly meetings for children.

Other useful agencies are the Summer Holiday Home for poor girls, the Forest Cottage Home for delicate children, extensive temperance organisations, provident clubs, the coffee palace, &c. The Mission's operations are so numerous and extensive that it will be readily seen that a large expenditure of money is necessary. Already the intensity of winter has been felt, and with the continuance of bitterly cold weather, the heartrending cry of the hungry and starving which Mr. Charrington and his helpers are hearing daily will grow more urgent as the distress becomes more acute, with hundreds of unemployed and their families lacking the necessaries of life.

Among Merchant Seamen.

MISS CHILD'S "WELCOME HOME."

THE approach of Christmas is a very important time in Miss Child's work among the merchant seamen of various nationalities who resort to her Home and Mission on their arrival in the port of London. Their hardships and difficulties while at sea, and the loneliness of their lives, cause them to look forward with great delight to the hope of being once more at "Home," as so many of them love to call the place where they first came in contact with real friends, and where they are helped to lead changed and better lives.

The many shipwrecks lately have brought great distress. One dear man, who has only escaped with his life, writes:—

"Dear Miss Child,—The storm was terrible, and lasted many hours. The ship became a perfect wreck. Two of the crew lost their lives, and the rest of us were picked up in a terrible state. I have been ill ever since, and fear I can never go to sea again. I am very thankful God has spared my life that I may have the joy of telling out again the old, old story of Jesus and His love. I hope to come soon and see you all, and am trying hard to get well enough to come to you again at the dear place I always call home.—Yours in Christ,

ONE OF THE C. L. B. C."

The number of men out of work in and around Canning Town is quite distressing.

Miss Child and her friends are anxious to continue to substantially benefit these sons of the sea while they are on shore again this Christmas time, and will be glad of any help towards these efforts. Her address is, "Welcome Home" for Sailors, Canning Town, London, E.

In Needy Villages.

ANOTHER season of toil has been completed in some of the southern villages of England in connection with the Hants and Southern Counties Village Mission, which Mr. J. Hassell Charlton has so long and usefully directed. During the past year over 200 villages have been visited by the evangelists, and from a brief record of their operations some interesting facts may be gleaned. Mr. Charlton says:—"Our gracious God has permitted us to bring the light of the Gospel to many a despairing soul. Many aged and infirm men and women have welcomed our visits with delight. There are still great numbers of these unable to read a word. In many cases it has been most difficult to tear ourselves away from them, and very many have received blessing. Work amongst the children has proved most hopeful and encouraging, and Bible readings have been attended with hopeful results. Open-air meetings this year have been less frequent on account of inclement weather.

"Our Gospel Literature Mission has been especially successful during the whole year. Five thousand of the most helpful books have been disposed of at prices easily obtainable by every one, but amounting to nearly £200 at published price. And no sweeter Gospel message, or counsel for anxious souls and others, could by any means be placed in their hands. This in itself is a glorious opportunity of providing an antidote to not only the vicious and basely immoral literature destroying the lives and character, more or less, of millions of all classes of young men and women, and an awful barrier to the Gospel, but also to open the eyes of those who are ensnared by the false doctrines and the subtleties of ritualism and disguised Romanism now so rampant in thousands of villages, where it is even more intolerant and dangerous than in towns and cities."

The Ever-Open Door.

"FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN."

MANY years ago, one dark night, a well-known clergyman was accosted by two young women in the street, and he stopped to exhort them to leave their evil lives. "Well," said one, "suppose I was willing, would you take me to your home to-night to rescue me?" Near by was one of the old-fashioned penitentiaries (now, happily, modernized), and the clergyman said, "To-morrow;" but with bitter scorn the poor creature exclaimed, "To-morrow! To-night must be passed before to-morrow." Alas, it was too true!—

Oh, it was pitiful,
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.

Happily the claims of the friendless and fallen upon the Christian sympathy of the Church of Christ are now more fully recognised; although, even now, they are realized by comparatively few. It is, however, an important fact that there is now an "ever open door" for any poor young women or girls who desire to forsake their evil lives.

The Society, so well known under its short title of "Friendless and Fallen," has been seeking to save the lost for the past forty-six years, and upwards of 38,000 have been assisted through the medium of its six Homes, to make a fresh start in life. One of the homes is for fifty respectable friendless young girls brought out from environments of imminent moral peril; four others are for the rescue of upwards of a hundred penitent young women, and in addition there is an open-all-night Refuge for the immediate succour of both classes who may be found destitute in the streets at night. In these various homes 180 inmates can be accommodated, and in them they receive both Christian instruction and industrial training, before being placed out again in life.

Of the good results of this mission of mercy it is impossible to speak fully in this brief account of the work, as they would require a large volume in which to record them. The following may, however, be cited, as it comes from an independent source.

The late Canon Champneys once related that when he was a young man, he, with others, was instrumental in opening a home for women. The first case was subsequently placed in service with a clergyman, a widower, with several children. She was not only a servant to his household but was like a mother to his motherless children, and guarded them with the utmost jealousy against evil; and this woman, who had once been living an abandoned life at Oxford, became, by God's grace, "a focus of holiness and a centre of purity." Such instances of the

could be multiplied by hundreds, and are an evidence of the success of a work which was neglected too long by the Christian Church, but which has yielded a rich harvest of precious souls. To discriminate amid the almost endless variety of character represented by those who seek admission to these Homes, so as to know exactly what lesson to teach and the best kind of help to render, requires not only a large acquaintance with human nature generally, but with these classes in particular; and this experience, after thirty-five years' labour, the present secretary is able to bring to bear on the work—often with the happiest results. Some of the records of the Society read more like romance than the dry details of rescue and preventive work one would expect to meet with. Among the more recent publications of the Society are "Notes by the Way," "The Wanderer," "Gathered Home," "Weary unto Death," "The Worn Footpath," &c., and copies will be sent to any address upon application.

It may be added that a subscriber has recently offered to give the sum of £50 if five or six others will join with him in a similar manner. Is it too much to hope that, at the season of goodwill, some who read this brief record may embrace the opportunity substantially to help this mission of mercy? WILLIAM J. TAYLOR

"Remember my Bonds."

ST. GILES' CHRISTIAN MISSION.

HE who originally sent this message to the Church has long since been loosed from his bondage. He knows now the "eternal weight of glory," "the crown of life," and his Master's immediate presence.

He was in bondage at Rome, because he accepted and preached the Gospel. His body was in bondage, his mind was at liberty. To-day, in London, thousands, literally thousands, are in bondage, just because they do not accept the Gospel.

To the attentive Christian ear no cry in London is more clamant, persistent, continuous, and pathetic than that contained in the sentence, "Remember my bonds." The words, it is true, are seldom, if ever, spoken; but, though inarticulate, they are forcible and demand consideration.

"Remember my bonds," silently says the infant child, just born to drunken parents in some filthy slum. "Remember my bondage of heredity, of environment, of evil example, and of parental neglect."

"Remember my bonds," says the young boy just starting life; and though he utters no spoken words, we must listen to him, for he, and such as he, are the future men of England. "Remember! I was thrown into the world and on my own resources before I was well into my teens; and here I am, uncared for and alone, a ready tool for the unscrupulous, and surrounded by temptation."

"Remember my bonds," says the young woman, fighting life's battle in her feeble strength. "Remember my unsheltered existence, my struggles to obtain a living and retain purity. Remember the strength of the forces against me."

"Remember my bonds," sobbingly says the weary wife of the prisoner. "Remember the yet unfinished tale of misery my whole married life has been; how that my husband, who should be here caring for wife and children, is shut up in prison."

"Remember my bonds," mutters the prisoner in the silence of his cell, as he curses himself for a fool. "Remember the opportunities I have wasted, the evil I have done, the chain I have forged, link by link, for my own wearing; but, as you remember, do so with pity, and let some compassion come into your thoughts, for 'my sin is greater than I can bear.'"

"Remember my bonds," groans the man in declining years, unemployed because of sickness and misfortune. "Remember, I have worked hard, very hard, but all the little I had has vanished in my illness and weakness, and now I can see but two steps before me, the workhouse and the grave." The very air of London is CHARGED WITH THE UNSPOKEN CRY.

It comes from young and old, from the rich as well as the poor, and myriad hearts in their sore need are sending their message to the Church of Christ:—"Remember my bonds, and MINE, and MINE, and MINE!"

The Church which makes no strenuous effort, God helping it, to answer the cry fittingly, fails, by its very negligence, to justify its own existence. When the Redeemer of mankind came to earth, His one purpose was to redeem men, to make them holy, to bring them into likeness to Himself. His object was not to institute systems of theology, nor to set up a gorgeous imposing ritual. No! His great purpose, the purpose for which He lived in poverty and died in agony, was the ultimate good and goodness of mankind.

Now the claims of the St. Giles' Christian Mission upon the prayers, sympathy and financial support of the public have often been advocated in this paper, not only in recent years, but ever since the Mission was instituted forty-three years ago. It is only a fair question, therefore, to ask whether the Mission is justifying its existence by the work it performs.

Surely an unbiassed mind can do no other than answer the question in the affirmative. The Mission hears and answers the cry of all the classes to which we have referred above.

For the children there is the patient, loving teaching of the Sunday-schools, and children's services; and the sheltering care of the Homes and Orphanages at Maldon, in Essex. For the

there are the five Boys' Homes, signifying and embodying a "chance in life" for those who have either never had one, or who, having had one, have foolishly spoiled it.

For the friendless young women, in need of advice and home, the doors of the Mission's Institute in Drury Lane are always open. For the innocent but suffering wives and children of prisoners, provision is made, and the help rendered prevents many a humble home and family from being broken up.

For the adult ex-prisoners employment is found, and every effort made to lead them into paths of sobriety and rectitude. For the aged and infirm, for the sick and destitute, the Mission labours and provides constantly by means of its house-to-house visitors and trained nurse. Such a many-sided and extensive work needs and deserves liberal support, that the year's accounts may close without a deficit. "These Little Ones."

LIVERPOOL SHELTERING HOMES.

SOME of us think nothing of a story unless it has a good ending, and though this story begins in sorrow, rags and despair, readers will find that the finale ends brightly and happily.

John A— had drifted into drinking habits and had ceased to care for wife or children, but after the birth of baby Charlotte, who was partly paralysed, the wife was unable to gain strength; how could she, without nourishing food or restful nights? At last her mind gave way under the starvation and hopeless misery of her life, and one morning she went into the back yard and hanged herself. What a scene and what a sorrow for the children to come upon when they awoke! Poor mother! her love had been the one bit of brightness in their wretched lives, and now she was gone. The father gave way entirely to his intemperate habits, and the family were left in a starving condition. Neighbours, poor as themselves, were powerless to help, and finally a City missionary was appealed to. He promised to take them right away if the father would agree, and place them under Mrs. Birt's care in the Sheltering Home.

So one bitter winter's day, this forlorn, tattered little family were ushered into the Home, and very soon Mrs. Birt was listening to their sad story, and agreeing to take them. The father signed the paper making Mrs. Birt their guardian. Such a tubbing and combing followed, and our little friends were soon transformed in appearance. They stayed some months in the Home. At last spring came, and after a grand voyage they reached the Canadian Home, where a warm welcome awaited them. Johnnie and Willie went to live with farmers, and were only a short distance from each other, meeting always at church and Sunday-school. Little Emily was adopted, and Lucy was taken by a fine Christian family as maid. The choice was never regretted either by Lucy or the family; she has remained there seven years, growing more attached to the kind friends who have guided her so gently. She has helped to nurse the aged head of the family, and her mistress also, until they passed away, and now remains in the service of the daughter. To her joy just recently Lucy visited her brothers and sister, and found them happy in their farm-homes, the boys growing true and manly far away from the temptations of city life. She has helped her eldest sister and her husband out to Canada, where they are now prospering and able to give a home to the youngest sister, who, through the good care given to her, is growing stronger. Now the whole family are out in our hospitable Dominion, growing up independent of charitable help, among Christian surroundings.

What a changed prospect from that before them if left in the misery of low life in Liverpool! Many other young people who have gone out through the Sheltering Home have sent for their families in a similar way. Mrs. Birt now desires to take out another band of children, rescued from scenes such as these, to the land of the maple leaf, where they have every opportunity to do well. £10 provides passage money and outfit for one child. The Robins' Christmas Dinner to 5,000 of the poorest boys and girls in Liverpool will be given in St. George's Hall on December 31. A Widows' Sewing Class, for 180 poor aged widows, is held weekly. The address of the Home is Myrtle Street, Liverpool.

Amid Blackfriars Squalor.

"CAN you please teach us to read?" This was the question asked by a poor woman in the Blackfriars district of London, of one of the lady workers at the Hope Mission in Friar Street, S.E. "I will try," was the reply, and soon a class of women was formed. In six weeks they could master simple words. "I study the advertising boards as I go to my office-cleaning of a morning," said the spokeswoman, "they have such big letters, you know, but oh, I do like to read John iii. 16." Her ambition was soon gratified; John iii. 16 was the first text she read clearly; and the next result was a desire to find the Saviour, pointedly if oddly expressed in a humble prayer, "O God, do make me —— John iii. 16."

This incident illustrates both the spirit of the Mission and the type of people among whom its efforts are maintained. When taken over in 1893, from Lady Hope, the centre of work was in Nelson Square, S.E., but in 1897 Miss Martin, the honorary superintendent devoted herself to the arduous task of securing new premises. A fine block of buildings was subsequently erected in Friar Street, where a thriving Gospel Mission is carried on with much spiritual encouragement.

The neighbourhood is a squalid one, inhabited chiefly by costermongers and their families. Poverty, drink, and impurity have to be combated; and the antagonistic influence of aggressive sacerdotalism is considerable, yet the proclamation of the evangel is effective. Conducted on undenominational lines, the Mission has quietly but steadily prospered. The building debt has been cleared, and the many branches of work crowned with blessing. Not a few of the devoted band who rally round Miss Martin are themselves converts of the Mission. The Lord's Day services are bright and helpful, while the large and important Sunday-school taxes the accommodation to the utmost—encouraging facts in a district like this where the workers were warned:—"Don't go down that court, or you'll be robbed."

In order to embrace enlarging opportunities, an evangelist has just been appointed; and it is hoped that Miss Martin, who has so generously contributed to the expenses, erection and upkeep, will, with increased responsibilities, receive the sympathy and encouragement of a wider circle of friends.

A Veteran Society.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY.

AMONG the many societies that seek to reach the masses of London and win them for Christ, there is none older than this. Formed in the seventeenth century, it existed then as a very tiny "blade" in the "field" of the Great Husbandman. Under the care and enthusiasm of the immortal Wesley, it grew in the eighteenth century to the "ear;" then in the twentieth it has come to the "full corn in the ear."

Although the Society is getting old, it retains "the dew of its youth." The same loyalty to Christ and His Gospel, the same love for souls, the same faith in the Cross as the Divine method of human redemption and social reformation that characterized its childhood, are still the marks of its maturer years.

This is the secret of its vitality, its power, and progress. It was born of the "incorruptible seed," and is a tree of the Lord, full of sap, whose leaf cannot wither, and whose fruit will neither decay nor fail. A perusal of the last report fills the reader with feelings of gratitude, and inspires him with hope. The work of the past year is as vigorous and fruitful as ever. Humanly speaking, the efficiency and success of so manifold a work are due to the indefatigable and devoted secretaries, Messrs. Atkinson and Seager, who are also to be congratulated upon having round them a band of men and women, whose capabilities and devotion may be equalled, but cannot be surpassed by any society in London.

The centre of the Society's operations is at the Memorial Hall, Bethnal Green. During the year evangelistic services have been held on Sundays and week-nights, well-attended by the people of the crowded neighbourhood. Here also a most efficient Sunday-school and a Band of Mercy are carried on with very cheering results. There is also a free library divided into two departments, viz., a reference library containing 30,000 volumes, and a loan department of 8,000 volumes. This is a great boon to the residents of the district, who are chiefly of the working-classes, and are glad of such a privilege. Lectures, high class concerts, educational classes are maintained and well attended, and for the comfort, cheer, and help of old and young.

In seven other districts there are mission halls, which are equally fruitful branches of the work. During the year the preaching of the Gospel has been attended with great success in the halls; and the other agencies, such as mothers' meetings, Bible classes, sewing meetings for young girls, self-help clubs, mutual improvement societies, Sunday-schools, bands of hope, Christian Endeavour, &c., have all been prosecuted with vigour and diligence, with the result that numbers have been added not only to the respective societies, but added to the great "household of faith." No report can reveal the good accomplished by these various agencies in the help rendered to many in straits through hard times and hardening poverty, the sympathy given to the troubled, the comfort tendered to the sick, the hope kindled in the souls of those dying in dark places, friendless and alone.

The great and good service done in connection with the workhouse and its infirmaries and wards, has been maintained successfully during the year. There has been weekly visitation among the mass of poor people who, from various causes, are to be found in such places. The visitors are composed of a band of volunteers numbering 200, and these keep at the blessed work of visiting their poor and unfortunate brothers and sisters all the year round, in many cases with most happy spiritual results, and in all cases with the sense of the Divine favour resting upon them in their self-denying labours for the weary and sick and heavy laden. Services held in the dining-halls or sitting-rooms have been largely attended by the inmates, who enjoy the hymns, and give eager and reverent heed to the "Word preached." In many other ways the Society has rendered splendid service among the 15,000 of the "poor and ignorant and out of the way" who live within the walls of the workhouses, infirmaries, and casual wards of our great city.

Another branch of the work is that of the lodging-houses. Bands of workers have been engaged throughout the past year in Notting Hill, Haggerston, Borough, St. Luke's, Westminster, Spitalfields, and also at Hastings, Brighton and Southsea. This is the hardest sphere of the Society's operations. The class of people who sink to the level of the common lodging-house, and can be content with it are almost beyond the reach of finer influences. But the "impossible" to man is the "possible" to God, and out of these depths many have been rescued, and their feet placed in ways that lead upward by the "good Samaritans" of the Christian Community.

Open-air preaching is a conspicuous feature of the year's work. Besides holding special services in other places on certain occasions the Society has maintained the work of preaching the Gospel to the multitudes in the "highways and hedges," at its twenty regularly-appointed stations.

In street and alley and slum the missioners have gone with the publication of the good news, and great have been the companies of those who followed. So the seed has fallen as it fell in Galilee. Some doubtless on stony ground, some among thorns, but doubtless also some on good ground.

In addition to all this "abounding labour" there has been a constant distribution of religious literature in the form of tracts, periodicals, and booklets.

During the year the Society has had its hands full as usual with the needs of the poor, who are always with us, and who multiply annually in London at an appalling rate. A great social and benevolent work has been discharged throughout the year by the "Community" through giving free breakfasts—followed always by a Gospel address, free teas, free suppers, in the Central Hall, and at all the mission halls.

Dinners, teas, and suppers have been given to the poor children. Employment has been found for poor widows and aged spinsters. Shelter has been provided at night for multitudes who otherwise would have had no place to lay their heads. Christmas dinners have been provided for poor families. Food, coal, clothing have been dispensed to the needy. The Children's Home at Epping Forest has been efficiently maintained, many little ones from London receiving new life in mind and body from the benefits derived at the "Holiday Home." Old and young had their day in the country, and 5,000 of the inmates of the workhouse also had their day—such days being "as a day of the son of man upon earth." The year's work is second to none of the Society's history. On looking back upon the manifold work accomplished, the retrospect is one that should inspire all supporters of the "Community" with unabated, yea, intensified confidence, all the workers with fresh courage and enthusiasm, all good Christians and good citizens with gratitude and hope.

C.E.T.S. Homes for Inebriates. — It is gratifying to note the useful purpose which is being served by the Voluntary Homes for Women Inebriates, maintained by the Church of England Temperance Society. Situated at Herne Hill, Torquay, and Terrington, the institutions afford accommodation for eighty-seven patients. Three classes of inmates are received, drawing-room, work-room, and kitchen patients. The Homes are true harbours of refuge where the victims of intemperance may regain health and strength, morally and physically, to fight against their terrible temptation. It is important to remember that in these Homes the Society provides for a class of inebriates for whom the Government makes no provision whatever—those addicted to the habit of secret drinking. The Society has also a home for men at Whatlington, near Battle, which is always full. At the present time the work is seriously hampered by a deficit of £500. With a view to the removal of this hindrance, Mrs. Temple, writing from the Old Palace, Canterbury, has addressed an earnest appeal to those who sympathize with the work of the Society.

Meeting Rome's Aggression.

THE PROTESTANT ALLIANCE.

THIS is the oldest undenominational Protestant society of a militant character. That this feature is necessary, and that it is vigorously maintained, is obvious. It has been well to the front during the past twelve months in its untiring efforts to resist the incursion of monks and nuns, whose advent in this country is due to stringent laws recently adopted by the French Government.

It will be remembered that France is nominally a "Catholic" country, and one, therefore, not likely to treat the so-called "Religious Orders" with uncalled-for or unnecessary severity. As a matter of fact, no law has been passed in France for their "expulsion," but the new law requires "registration," and this involved rather more inquiry than monks and nuns could face. In other words, they dreaded light upon their objects, methods, and principles, and they took flight from France to England, where convents are permitted without any inquiry (to say nothing of supervision) by His Majesty's Government.

From the moment that the Protestant Alliance announced its determination to test the legality of Jesuits and other male members of Rome's Religious Orders coming to this country rumours were circulated that the Act of 1829 (known as the Emancipation Act) could only be put in motion by the Attorney General, and that he would be advised that the Act is obsolete. Other difficulties were enumerated sufficient to discourage the attempt, but the Alliance proceeded; and although it cannot be said that this monkish invasion has been successfully repelled, the Alliance has obtained some important decisions in the High Court which has falsified the rumours industriously circulated by the Popish party.

We now know (for the High Court has declared) that (1) the Act of 1829 is not obsolete, and (2) that any private person may set the Act in motion.

Those of our readers who wish to acquire full information about the proceedings of the Protestant Alliance should read its monthly paper, the Protestant Alliance Magazine. The twelve monthly parts form an elegantly-bound volume, which, with its copious index, is worthy of a place among permanent literature, for it contains a series of articles on "The Tabernacle and the Temple," by Rev. A. A. Isaacs, M.A., and others on the Roman Catholic Church in Italy by Rev. Alexander Robertson, D.D. (of Venice), "The Papacy," "Convents," &c., which cover the whole ground of the Protestant controversy with Rome.

Most of these articles are finely illustrated. The November issue also contains illustrations on the Gunpowder Plot, the assassinations of two of the Kings of France, and an eloquently-written article showing that the prelates and priests of the Roman Church openly and shamelessly approved of those murders by two monks. A complete report of the arguments in the police-courts and in the High Court for the expulsion of the Jesuits is also given, and a remarkable document published by Papal authority (known as the Bull of Pope Clement XIV.) for the suppression of the Jesuits, makes up, not only a very strong case against the Order, but renders the volume in which it appears one of considerable value, seeing that the truth is presented in a cheap and convenient form (1s. 3d. post free), and is, therefore, within the reach of all.

Rome's aggression can only be successfully resisted by an organization like that now under review, which is watchful and wise, and worthy of generous support. The enemy is working with untiring energy to capture converts to a system which is dishonouring to God and inimical to the higher interests of man.

We understand that heavy costs have been incurred in the attempts to expel the Jesuits from the United Kingdom, and it is hoped that these costs will be met by special contributions, so that there may be no necessity to suspend the ordinary operations of the Alliance.

Within Our Gates.

THE STOCKWELL ORPHANAGE.

IF gratitude glows in the heart for the mercies of a year which is wearing to a close it will seek expression, not only in loving or friendly greetings, but in the language of substantial gifts. However serious the tax may prove, very few complain of its imposition; for the tax, after all, is but the free-will offering of love.

Christmas means much to the world; and any sacrifice we make in its observance is but the faintest echo of the sacrificial life which, enrobed in our humanity, "was manifested" by a beneficent ministry, and culminated in "the death of the cross," leaving us an example that we should "follow His steps."

Whatever may be the claims of kinsfolk and acquaintance at Christmas, the heart is not satisfied until some offering is made for those who, in the bitterness of their need, are the objects of our compassion. The aged poor in lonely homes, the inmates of our workhouses and asylums, the widows and fatherless in their affliction—these are selected as amongst those to whom we delight to "show the kindness of God;" and the ministry of an unostentatious charity is a gospel which appeals to the heart, and awakens a psalm of thanksgiving.

And to the donor, is there not a joy in the thought of having lightened another's burden, thus adding a ray of sunshine to dispel the gloom of saddened hearts and shadowed homes? "It is," as it ever has been, and ever will be, "more blessed to give than to receive," although the recipient considers he holds a monoply of blessing. Those who minister to others, however lowly the deeds, or however poor the gifts, are following in the footsteps of the Saviour, "who went about doing good;" and the thought of his approving smile is the inspiration of a pleasure which leaves no pang.

While desiring our friends to have due regard cto the claims of others, we are, of course, concerned for the family of nearly five hundred fatherless little ones who are the special objects of our care. Every penny required for their maintenance must come in loving gifts, and every penny so contributed goes direct to supply their need. That the orphans "Within our Gates" have never lacked a meal, and that the Institution has never been burdened with the incumbrance of debt, attest the faithfulness of God who has promised to be "a Father to the fatherless." Many are the instances of Divine interposition recorded in the history of our work or treasured in the memory of the managers.

The statement of the fact that nearly five hundred orphans are seated at our table every day is an eloquent appeal in itself. Our friends have so regarded it, and we trust they will continue to do so; but, as one and another pass away, our funds must decline unless the gaps thus occasioned are filled by successors, who will esteem it a privilege to share the burden of our orphan charge.

O friends! one loved of God and man, for Christ's sweet sake hath founded
A Home wherein His little ones can find a love unbounded;
And sheltering care for all their need; such ministry He prizes,
And as a perfumed sacrifice up to His Throne it rises.

This Christmas-tide, will you not share this service of compassion,
And link yourselves with such a work in most whole-hearted fashion?
Bring now your grateful gifts to God, these little ones to gather,
To tend, and train them here to seek the bosom of the Father.

Writing his last Christmas letter to the orphans from Mentone on December 21, 1891, Mr. Spurgeon said:—

"Enjoy yourselves, and feel grateful to the kind friends who find money to keep the Stockwell Orphanage supplied. Bless their loving hearts, they never let you want for anything. May they have the pleasure of seeing you all grow up to be good men and women."

The secretary is Mr. F. G. Ladds, Stockwell Orphanage, Clapham Road, London. S.W.

Quiet and Unobtrusive.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS.

"THE work of the Mission is being carried on from year to year in a quiet and unobtrusive way," is a characteristic statement in the latest issue of the Moravian Quarterly. Assuredly from the first "the principle of plod" has characterized the evangelistic endeavours of the United Brethren. In no boastful spirit, but to the glory of God, they appear before the world as the oldest missionary society, and it is notorious that they were the first to work among the lepers; and all along they have given special attention to races that have sunk the lowest, and whose needy condition commands tender compassion.

The Moravian Church is essentially a missionary organization. About one in sixty of the members are out in the field, preaching the Gospel in quite primitive simplicity. Such obedient sympathy with the Lord's great command, "Go ye into all the world," has been blessed to the communion itself, and has had a glorious entail of fruitfulness. Something like a hundred thousand souls have been gathered out of heathenism, an aggregate more than three times as great as the membership of the parent church. And the spheres? Among Eskimos and Red Indians, Australian aborigines and wanderers from the "roof of the world" in closed Tibet, in Central and South Africa, Surinam and the Moskito Coast, and among lepers in Jerusalem.

RETURNING GOOD FOR EVIL.

A worker in Alaska, Dr. Romig, speaks of the rigour of the climate, and says he has many calls for surgical aid. He was asked by letter from the Holy Cross Mission of the Roman Catholic Church to amputate a frost-bitten toe of one of the priests, Father Robout, who was fast becoming poisoned from the dead toe. Two large abscesses were attended to, and the toe removed. Mr. Stecker gives the sequel: "I was very thankful that Dr. Romig could help that Roman Catholic priest on the Yukon. It was returning good for evil, for about Christmas time he and his people made trouble for Mr. Helmich at Ougavig, and he wrote Mr. Helmich an insulting letter. He has since apologized, and has written that he had been misinformed! When he is able he will visit Mr. Helmich at Ougavig!"

Here is an extract from a recent report from North Queensland:—

"By God's goodness and mercy the work has grown. Out of a number of wild, ignorant savages a small congregation has been raised and clothed. Nay, more than that, where formerly Satan reigned supreme, and kept his prisoners captive in sin, cruelty, and superstition, the voice of prayer and song is heard. The character of our people—nay, even of the inhabitants of the whole district (a coast-line of fifty miles), has been greatly changed, but the results of the whole work cannot be indicated, by arithmetical figures.

"The Mapoon station is gradually changing from a native camp into a modern village. The aborigines, being a nation without recognised chiefs or constitution, order has had to be secured, if only for the sake of those more peaceably inclined. It is Christianity which has now given these moral lepers at and near Mapoon new regulations and a new system of Christian ethics as well as a common-sense law. A kind of local government had to be inaugurated, the natives themselves acting as jury. Justice is tempered with mercy according to the lights of the offenders. The proceedings are always begun and ended with prayer, and the solemnity is often even more apparent than during a divine service."

The co-operation of British Christians in this grand work is facilitated by the existence of the London Association in Aid of the Moravian Missions, the offices of which are at 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn, W.C. Just now co-operation is urgently called for; the Leper Home at Jerusalem still requires funds for its new water supply; the Labrador Mission, hitherto self-supporting, must be helped for a few years to the extent of £2,000 per annum; and the General Fund is much behind.

Rev. W. Wetton Cox, secretary, writes: "So critical is the financial situation, that in some fields the staff has been reduced, extensions forbidden, and reinforcements detained at home. In fact, some who are in training have been notified that, unless funds increase, their services will not be required! Such a financial condition should excite prayerful concern on the part of friends of the Moravian Church and its noble work in heathen lands.

Italy's Millions.

THE SPEZIA MISSION.

A WORK of singular interest is being done, under circumstances of exceptional difficulty, by the Spezia Mission for Italy and the Levant. The wide field this Mission covers, and the remarkable character of its operations, are now well known among those who are interested in the progress of the Gospel in the difficult fields where the Papacy holds sway.

In the very heart of the land where the Vatican still has such fearful power, and constantly exposed to the most unscrupulous and bitter opposition, the Spezia Mission is doing splendid service.

The headquarters of the work are at Spezia, a city on the great main line to Rome. It is a most important military and naval centre, with a great and rapidly-growing civilian population. The mission has gained a powerful influence, and, in the words of a chief judge of the Italian Naval Courts, himself no Protestant, has "changed for good the whole of northern Italy." Since that was said the Mission has widely extended its operations. At its many preaching stations the Gospel is constantly proclaimed. Its great day schools, which draw 95 per cent. of their many hundreds of children from Roman Catholic and agnostic families, give a first class elementary education, the best to be obtained in Italy, and are open free to the very poorest, while the teaching of Christ and His Gospel are kept in the first place every day.

Sunday-schools are flourishing. A most interesting work is being done among the men of the Italian army and navy, while a special effort is made to reach and bless the seafaring folk from other lands, especially those from England. Several of the ablest and most devoted of the workers were once priests and friars of the Roman church, whom God has used the Mission to win to Him. The stations of the Spezia Mission cover a wide district, the most northerly being 260 miles from the most southerly.

No branch of the work is more touching than that among the fatherless and motherless children. Into the Spezia Mission Orphanage only the most needy children are admitted, and it is often hard to choose. To save these children from the fearful evil which in Italy constantly imperils defenceless orphan girls is a high privilege indeed, and the hearts of the leaders of the Mission are very sore when they have, for sheer lack of means, to shut their doors against pitiful need. Surely there are some of our readers who would find their own Christmas fireside brighter and their New Year fuller of joy if they would send to the Spezia Mission the means to save another of these defenceless lambs for the flock of the Good Shepherd.

We think of Italy as a land of sunshine, but in the northern provinces it is now bitterly cold and the distress is very great. Substantial help in the various branches of the Mission's work would be a great cheer to the workers.

One who recently visited Italy says:—"The most astonishing thing of all is that this widely-spread work is carried on at so small an expenditure—a sum, indeed, spent by many of our churches at home in doing only a quarter of what is done in Spezia."

The treasurer of the mission is Mr. F. A. Bevan, 54, Lombard Street, E.C. Fuller information will be gladly given by the English representative of the Mission, Mr. C. W. Cotton, Donington House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C. P.

"A MISSION OF HELP."

The N.-E. LONDON GOSPEL MISSION has for more than thirty years been under the personal care of Mr. Wm. CHORLEY, its present Director.

The labours are both Evangelistic and Philanthropic, specially seeking to help the deserving Poor. There are Homes of Rest for the sick and ailing at Lancing-on-Sea, Sussex.

OUR WINTER FUND.

The heart-breaking scenes we are daily witnessing would be hard to describe. Mothers with tender-aged children anxiously wait day after day hoping that father's return will bring good news, alas! only to be disappointed. One mother, in a home where drink is never seen, told us they had to retire the other night with only a cup of cold water and nothing to eat, and the mother had a child at the breast.

CONTRIBUTIONS would be most thankfully received by Mrs. F. A. BEVAN, 27, Queen's Gate Gardens, South Kensington, S.W.; by the Director, Mr. WM. CHORLEY, 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, London, N.; or may be sent to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

THE HOLY BIBLE (Authorised Version)

In Seven Styles, Printed on the Oxford India Paper.

THIS paper is a speciality of the Oxford University Press, having been expressly manufactured to meet the popular demand for thin books. Its characteristics are:—

Extreme Opaqueness,

Great Toughness and Strength,

Softness of Surface,

A Delicate and Agreeable Tone.

The durability and flexibility of the fibre are so great that the paper may be used for years without becoming injured by wear; and the material is so concentrated that it can be made to a degree of thinness only limited by the possibilities of printing. Yet the paper is beautifully soft to the touch, is strong enough to bear a great strain, and of such opacity that the impression on one side does not show through when the other side is being read.

THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

CHAPTER 1.

1 The creation of heaven and earth, 3 of the light, 6 of the firmament, 9 of the earth separated from the waters, 11 and made fruitful, 14 of the sun, moon, and stars, 20 of fish and fowl, 24 of beasts and cattle, 26 of man in the image of God. 29 The appointment of food.

IN the [c] beginning [d] God created the heaven and the earth.

2 And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. [e] And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

3 [f] And God said, [g] Let there be light: and there was light.

4 And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided [3] the light from the darkness.

5 And God called the light [1] Day, and the darkness he called Night. [5] And the evening and the morning were the first day.

6 ¶ And God said, [m] Let there be a [9] firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

7 And God made the firmament, [o] and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were [p] above the firmament: and it was so.

8 And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

9 ¶ And God said, [r] Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so.

10 And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.

11 And God said, Let the earth [t] bring forth [2] grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding [u] fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so.

12 And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

13 And the evening and the morning were the third day.

14 ¶ And God said, Let there be [a] lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide [3] the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and [a] for seasons, and for days, and years:

15 And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so.

16 And God [b] made two great lights; the greater light [z] to rule the day, and [c] the lesser light to rule the night: he made [f] the stars also.

17 And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth,

18 And to [h] rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good.

19 And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

20 And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the [4] moving creature that hath [6] life, and [7] fowl that may fly above the earth in the [8] open firmament of heaven.

21 And [n] God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

22 And God blessed them, saying, [q] Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

23 And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

24 ¶ And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so.

25 And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

26 ¶ And God said, [w] Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and [2] let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

A Fortnight in Burma.—III.

NEXT to the Burmese the Karens are the most numerous race. Up to 1829 they were not known as a separate nation, but looked upon as a mixed horde of savage aborigines, despised and oppressed by the Burmans. They are the most interesting people in relation to Christianity. Their belief as to their past history is, that they came from Central Asia about thirteen centuries ago, and that on their way they crossed the desert of Gobi, called the "Sea of Rolling Sand." They never were idol-worshippers, their tradition being that once they were in possession of a book which had been given them from God, the Creator of all things, but that it had been lost, and would be brought to them again by a white man from across the waters.

Dr. Judson was the first to be greeted by them as their deliverer. He had freed from a Burman master a Karen slave whom he employed as water-carrier. This man one day came across a Burmese tract. Certain words in it struck him. He read Burmese with great difficulty, but did not rest until he was able to master the whole of the contents. What he read was a revelation to him. Why, this was the teaching of his people, the long-predicted and longed-for return of God through a white man. He was overcome with joy, and begged his master to go to them.

VISIT TO A KAREN VILLAGE.

As he expected, the messenger was gladly welcomed, and the good tidings eagerly were received. Ko Tha Byu himself became their first evangelist, fervently proclaiming for a generation the restoration of the Karen nation, and the return of their God to them. Mrs. Armstrong, previous to and some time after her marriage, devoted herself to mission work among the Karens, and came to love them dearly. "Would you like to see a Karen village?" she said one day. Following our eager acceptance of the proposal there was a busy packing of provisions, a clatter of forks and of crockery, for we had a day's excursion before us, and no refreshment-rooms to look forward to. The next day we started early by train. After three hours' journey the nearest station was reached. Twelve miles more lay before us through paddy-fields, from which the crops of rice had just been gathered.

As we continued our journey in shaky gharries, drawn by skeleton-like ponies, Mrs. Armstrong explained to us the mode of rice cultivation. The stubble is burned before the fields are put under water, which reduces the soil to a soft sea of mud. Where the south-west monsoon does its effective work, there is no need of irrigation. The seed is sown in the nurseries, and the young plants one by one are put into the ground by hand. There are over a hundred varieties of rice known to the Burmese. To assure abundant harvests for their land the kings of Burma used to put once a year their hands to the plough.

AN IMPRESSIVE MEETING.

At midday we reached a village, but it was not the one we were bound for, and where we were expected. However, we followed our leader to the chapel, a shed built on posts, like most of the Burmese houses, with a neck-breaking ascent and a floor made of loose planks, which at every step cracked and bent under our feet. We were not sorry when, after a little while, the head men of the village and their women came to ask us to their house. A notch-ladder (a piece of trunk with indentations) led to a verandah on the shady side of the house, which they were endeavouring to fit up for our use. The first thing our eyes fell upon was a Singer's sewing-machine. Some cut pieces of calico told of its recent use. While the boy was warming our food, two of us quietly slipped back into the chapel for a little quiet. While there, one young girl after another came in, gave us an inquiring glance, and then quietly sat down in the corner of the room. A young woman, probably the leader, turned in last. Without taking any further notice of us, they knelt down, prayed, sang one of Sankey's tunes, read the Bible which the young woman seemed to explain, and prayed. The meeting lasted about half an hour and impressed us as something usual in their daily lives.

On our return to our host's house, we saw the verandah transformed into a comfortable dining-room. Along with some couches and chairs, a table and a dressing-table found their way hither and were covered with some kind of shawls. In her wise and tactful way, Mrs. Armstrong explained to us why she would not remove this strange table-cloth for a white one of hers. Those dear people were trying their best to please us. They turned out all their treasures, heaped up pillows, rugs, and mats into comfortable resting couches. The only thing we could do in return was to appreciate their kindness and to make full use of it. Their beaming faces told plainly how welcome we were.

By the time we had finished our meal, a fair number of children and older people had gathered around us, holding themselves at a becoming distance, until we had done with knives and forks and were able to begin the meeting.

It was a blessed time. The village choir, mostly young women, sang. The native preacher, from the neighbouring village where we had been expected, came to join in the worship, and to help in the translation of the message. The missionary's visit means a holiday to the villagers. They drop every work in order to be at his bidding. The Karens are to native churches. Mr. Smeaton, a Bengal civilian, who served in Burma, thus describes the effects of Christianity upon the Karens:—

"Once a village has embraced Christianity, it feels itself a head and shoulders above its neighbours, and all the energies of the people are at once employed in making their village worthy of the name; no labour, no expense is spared. The Christian village must be clean, healthy, and neat. It must have the best school and the best church they can afford. Money aid from the missionaries is not sought; the people do it all themselves—plan, contrive, and carry out. They are proud of their new conditions, and their zeal knows no bounds. Their children must be well dressed and educated, intelligent and industrious in their calling, better tillers of the soil, better hunters, better foresters than their fathers, because they are now animated by a new spirit, fired with a new zeal, and their wits are sharpened by education. The coming of Christianity has honoured their national traditions.

A NEW LIFE OPENS OUT TO THEM—a new career for which their forefathers had sighed in the ages of hardship, oppression, and slavery.

There are now about thirty-five to thirty-six thousand Karen Christians (Protestants) in Burma. At Rangoon, their educational centre, they are now building a beautiful church, which will hold over 2,000. It is to be the "Winton Memorial Church," in honour of the Winton family, whose third generation is now in the mission field. The old chapel was the first European building in Rangoon. The second was the old mission house, now used as dormitories for the school boarders. About forty Christian homes cluster around the mission compound. There are 115 churches in the district itself, with about 8,000 members. Only one native evangelist is supported by friends. All the others are paid by the people themselves.

One day we made a pleasant though short visit to Thonze (a journey of eight hours there and back), where Mrs. Ingalls, a lady of seventy-three, still lets her light shine. She came to Burma when quite young. American by birth, she has great love for the British, especially for Great Britain's late Queen Victoria, whose picture is multiplied in her house. With pride she showed us a Bible bearing the great Queen's signature, which many years ago was sent through her to Theebaw's Queen. In a mysterious way the book found its way back to the sender, and is now Mrs. Ingall's unique treasure.

Our visit to her was so brief that we are hardly able to disentangle our impressions. At the last station but one a school of children, with their English-speaking teachers, came to pay us their respects, to use Mrs. Ingall's own words. Before entering her house we had to pass by a both of stone. Our hostess explained that she liked to ask her Burmese visitors questions like, "Are you not afraid of my dog?" "No." "Why not?" "Because there is no life in it." "Then, why do worship a Buddha of stone, likewise without life?" The conversation is thus put a-rolling upon the subject most dear to her heart, and opportunity for a Gospel message is afforded.

As it was in the heat of the day, Mrs. Ingalls would motherly keep us indoors. The oldest Christian would stand by her side to shake hands with us. The schoolgirls and teachers were sent for and passed by us in a row, all prettily dressed in Burmese and with nosegays in their smooth black hair.

A Buddhist priest was also there in his yellow robe, which he stripped off and presented to us as a token of remembrance of one who had become a new man in Christ Jesus. In her dealing with souls, Mrs. Ingalls seems to have been especially helpful to Buddhist priests. She can number as many as sixty having professed conversion through her. Not all the cases were genuine. Some disappointed her after giving her much hope. Still

NOT A FEW HAVE REMAINED FAITHFUL.

Among the friends to whom she wished to be remembered were Mr. Seagram, of the Bible League; Mr. Turner, of the Pure Literature Society, who have supplied her with literature for the railway employés, in whom she is deeply interested; and Mr. William Luff, whose songs are sung in Burmese. She would be greatly obliged to friends for books of an entertaining kind, such as anecdotes referring to lives of great men, anything about the late Queen, bound up magazines, like the Leisure Hour, Sunday at Home, &c. Her libraries at the railways for the English-speaking people are well supplied with spiritual literature. It is the lighter kind that is wanted. A kind friend used to send her Punch, which was much appreciated.

After India's Famines.

ONE of the most interesting of the various efforts being put forth by the missions working in our great Indian Empire for the permanent relief of those of our fellow-subjects who have suffered so severely in late years through famine, is that being carried on by Rev. J. C. Lawson at Aligarh, in the North-West Provinces.

Mr. Lawson is now well known in this country, and many kind helpers have rallied to his aid in helping to bear the responsibilities he has undertaken in full faith and reliance upon God.

During the three last famines Mr. Lawson and his colleagues have gained experience—saddening to a degree—of what is needed in order, not only to relieve the immediate distress caused, but to cope with the serious state of affairs when, though actually famine is ended, there is yet an impoverished population to be reckoned with, death having taken away many of the bread-winners, while those who are left behind are faced with sickness and poverty.

Mr. Lawson's aim has been

where on his seventeen acres of land he has erected a church, missionaries' home, widows' home, girls' and boys' orphanages, and workshops, where many trades are taught.

Instruction is daily given to the men and women and boys and girls in such branches of industry as the following:—building, carpentry, stonework, basket-making, weaving, lace-making, tailoring, printing, shoemaking, gardening, and bread-making.

Of course, many of these trades are very useful in supplying the needs of the settlement, and any surplus manufactures are sold outside. It must, however, be borne in mind that the aim of the work is not to be a successful "business"—it could never be that, for immediately a worker becomes proficient he or she is drafted out to earn a livelihood independently—but to act as a stepping-stone from poverty, weakness, and sickness to health, strength, and industry. But there is also always prayerfully and lovingly borne in mind—the grand aim of all missionary work, to win precious souls for the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus. That this has been done there is abundant evidence to prove, and who shall tell the mighty results the Holy Spirit of God may bring to pass through those who have, while passing through the homes and workshops at Aligarh, yielded their lives and powers to the service of King Jesus.

THE HIGHER AND GREATER AIM

The latest news from Aligarh is that there are a thousand people being cared for—sick ones nursed and strong ones taught to work at a trade—and that the funds available are not adequate to carry on the work without curtailment. The winter season makes demands too for warmer clothing and bedding.

Is there any form of missionary enterprise more deserving of the sympathy and help of God's people than this? It aims at the root of the chief obstacle to the reception of the Gospel in such a country, where so many people are sunken in hopeless poverty. "If a brother or sister be naked, and in lack of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Go in peace, be ye warmed and filled; and yet ye give them not the things needful to the body, what doth it profit?" (James ii. 15, 16).

Will all who read of this good work remember India's famine widows and orphans, so that the friends at Aligarh may, on your behalf, visit and feed and clothe them, and teach them how to work for their bodily sustenance; and also teach them of Jesus, the Mighty to Save. The mission is represented in England by the Foreign Missions Agency, 30, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Ikwezi-Lamaci Mission.

MR. PLANT (school inspector) visited us in June, and was much gratified with the schools, giving great praise to the two lady teachers.

The Girls' Home gives us encouragement, both in numbers and the result of "training." Another new girl is added, and several are promised before the term closes.

On the Sabbath previous to the holidays, we received into Church fellowship quite a number from heathenism, so lessening Satan's ranks, and thus adding to the number on the Lord's side. Since then, I rejoice to tell, two of M. Pikwa's wives have been converted, and others in his family are under strong conviction. He himself is showing much interest, though hesitating to declare himself openly as a Christian.

Inbona, our Amaci chief, has passed away. During his long illness he always welcomed Mr. Aitchison and the evangelists, listening to their prayers and talk, but we cannot tell if these things made any lasting impression. He desired his son and heir to make a friend of my husband, and left messages to be delivered after his death.

Now the war is over, there is much that should be better, both for the natives, the missions, and the country generally, when matters get righted. Good news comes from Gershom from time to time; he has just completed a long tour of inspection of native schools in Zululand, and has gained much valuable information as to ways and means of carrying on mission work.

Missionary Work in Colombia

COLOMBIA is the most northern of the South American Republics, embracing as it does the Isthmus of Panama and beyond. Travelling up the coast from Colon, which is the Atlantic port of the Isthmus, we come to Bocas del Toro, a large banana district. The plantations skirt the wide lagoons, and stretch on either side of the many rivers.

In this district Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Notman have for nearly five years been enabled to labour for God. The secretary of the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, under whose auspices they went forth, described the work as being tough, but the extraordinary circumstance of civil war in the country was not then taken into account. The Society inaugurated the effort in this place in 1892, though the Gospel had been preached and gladly received by the native coasters long before. Among the constant stream of emigrants from Jamaica and other West Indian Islands the Lord had His witnesses. These men were used of God, and traces of their industry and faithfulness can be clearly seen to-day. The little band of converts sent to Jamaica for a "shepherd." An earnest brother was sent out, and did good work, but owing to ill-health he could not continue long in the work there. Mr. and Mrs.

Notman followed him, with the object, if possible, of making the work self-supporting.

A PROSPEROUS EFFORT.

An enthusiastic welcome was given by the cosmopolitan community. Natives and Jamaicans who largely make up the membership; Spanish-speaking Colombians, who collect taxes and in other ways administer the laws; Americans and Germans who ship fruit and merchandise, all showed pleasure at the arrival of the missionaries.

The first members' meeting was specially interesting. A good majority of the ninety-eight were present. They reminded one another of their personal promises, as well as of their prayers, saying, "We have prayed for a shepherd, and God has sent us one," and again, "we have promised to support him, and now we must do it."

For three years all the working expenses of the Mission were met, additions and repairs being carried out, and no outside friends asked for money. Annual subscriptions were also sent to the Society for work elsewhere. The membership doubled in numbers, and one new station was opened. There is much pioneer work to be done, and native evangelists help in this work. Mr. Notman goes monthly on a short preaching tour lasting three or four days, often having the joy of speaking to three different audiences a day. Every two or three months he is able to go more to distant places, there being scores of settlements where it is impossible for the inhabitants to hear the Gospel. It is a usual thing to be told after a village service, "This is the first time the Gospel has been preached in this place."

The work has been hampered and hindered by

THE COLOMBIAN REVOLUTION.

Young men left their homes rather than be pressed into service. The people scattered on the farms to be safe from the bullets which were constantly whizzing aound. Night services were for a long time impossible owing to martial law. Traffic was hindered, and often stopped.

In April of this year, a battle took place in the town in which the missionaries live. For a whole year, Christian effort was disorganized. The few who gathered were startled at the slightest noise, and easily alarmed beyond control. All that could be done was to move in the midst of a panic-stricken people with words of cheer and comfort.

The Jamaica friends did all they could to keep up the work; but help is asked from God's people in England to pay a debt of £200 on the working expenses, and £150 to repair buildings.

Recent letters from Bocas del Toro state that the services and Sunday-school are well attended. Native evangelists are conducting them.

Mr. Notman, who is anxious to address meetings during his visit to this country, may be addressed at 11, Tudor Road, Hackney, N.E.

The Gospel in Ceylon.

AFTER a pleasant voyage in the Warwickshire, we arrived at Colombo on Sunday, October 25. I attended service in English in the C.M.S. Church, which was decorated with all manner of vegetables and fruits for the first Harvest Thanksgiving festival ever held in Colombo. On three consecutive nights I held evangelistic meetings in the lecture hall in connection with the Christian Endeavour Society of the Dutch Reform Church, besides speaking at a Band of Hope meeting of the Baptist Church.

A very interesting day was spent at the C.M.S. station at Cotta, six and a half miles from Colombo. The population is 200,000, chiefly Cingalese, who are Buddhists. The C.M.S. station is most picturesquely situated, overlooking a lake skirted by the most lovely vegetation. At 8.30 a.m. I spoke by interpretation to a most attentive audience of over 500 children and young people. At 10 o'clock I addressed some 70 Cingalese girls of the boarding school, many of whom spoke English fluently. At noon I was privileged to speak to Catechists, native ministers, and Bible-women.

There are 53 day schools with 3,469 boys and girls, a girls' boarding school with 75, a boys' English school with 300 scholars (90 of whom are Christians), besides a training class for schoolmasters. The work is carried on by Rev. and Mrs. J. W. Balding, who are doing a great work, while Mrs. and Miss Dowbiggin have charge of the girls' boarding school.

The Cingalese possess great faculties for learning by heart, but less facility in applying what they have thus learned.

Missionaries have a great enemy to fight in the enervating climate of the low country. Lassitude quickly steals over the European as it has over the Cingalese.

The faithfulness of God was surely confirmed in the experience of Rev. W. Oakley, of the C.M.S., who came to Ceylon in 1835, laboured as a missionary for fifty-three years without ever once going home to England, and died at the age of eighty. REGINALD A. STUDD.

Onitsha Industrial Mission.—On the eve of leaving for West Africa, Bishop Tugwell issued an appeal for the Onitsha Industrial Mission, which would meet a great need, and would, it is believed, become self-supporting. The training given, under the supervision of three Christian Englishmen, in sawing, carpentry, brickmaking, &c., would be thorough, and throughout the course of their training the lads would be under directly spiritual influences. The school cannot be worked effectively unless £2,000 is raised.

Home Missions.

Brighton Convention.

PREPARATORY meetings for prayer and addresses were held on the previous Saturday and Monday; but the Convention commenced on Tuesday, November 25, and continued for five days in the Royal Pavilion and the Dome. The speakers were true to their engagement; but Mr. Darlow Sarjeant had only just arrived when he received a telegram that Sister Emma, of Littlehampton, had died suddenly, so that he was obliged to leave at once, and could not take any part. The meetings were well attended, sometimes crowded, and the spiritual tone was eminently practical and devout.

Dr. PIERSON'S addresses upon the personality, wiles, and powers of the devil were masterly and powerful. He showed from the Scriptures that Christians have an adroit and vehement foe against whom they have to fight. Some of his points quite held the audience as they listened with breathless attention. Among other things he remarked: Robert Hall said, "The devil can dig a trench, but he cannot roof us in, for there is always an open way at the top which faith and prayer may climb." We may have a threefold enemy, but we have a threefold Friend who is omnipresent and omnipotent. It is possible, by faith in God, to change an assault of Satan into a gain, as an artist paints an ugly spot on a picture into light and beauty. Although temptations are inevitable, they are not invincible. It is possible so to dwell in the secret place of the Almighty that temptations have no power.

He summed up the work of the devil as diversion, delusion, a doubtful mind, a double mind, deadness, darkness, and delay, and explained each in detail. Armour is useless without strength to wear and use it. "The whole armour" is for defence, excepting the sword, and that is for both offensive and defensive warfare. Every temptation should be met as the Master met His, by saying, It is written. Jesus Christ, as our Intercessor, interposes between us and temptation when we are faithful to our troth. Satan can only secure what we concede. God giveth us the victory. God will make His people both loving and lovable, and in the brightness of His glory His saints do not even look upon the wiles and delusions of the evil one.

Pastor MONOD gave several addresses, and, as usual, many of his thoughts dropped as pearls which the hearers eagerly caught and treasured. Upon complete surrender of body and soul, and also upon light, he spoke with freshness and force. His address upon Peter in prison and his deliverance was most helpful. Herod vexed the Church, and continues even to do so to-day. Peter's imprisonment showed the military array versus a few praying believers, yet the simple disciples prevailed. He passed one gate, then a second, and then the iron gate opened of its own accord. Christians now come to iron gates, but go on in Christ's name and believing prayer, and they will open of their own accord, for on their behalf omnipotence is at work. The angel said, Follow, and Peter did as he was told. Our Master says, Follow Me. Shall we hesitate to obey? Closer than the nearest trial is Jesus Christ; so let all follow, and He will bring His people even through iron gates.

Rev. EVAN HOPKINS spoke helpfully upon Christians being God's workmanship, also upon learning when believers are still. Pastor FULLER GOOCH and Mr. FORDER also took part in the proceedings. Captain TOTTENHAM presided at all the meetings, and his chairmanship was a great feature of the convention.

The weather was generally unfavourable, but notwithstanding, the outcome of the Convention must do great and permanent good. Not only will many be quickened into activity, but into a great reverence for and closer study of the Holy Scriptures.

Winter at Costers' Hall.

THE comprehensive work which Mr. W. J. Orsman, J.P., instituted at Golden Lane over forty years ago, and which for twenty years or more has been continued at Costers' Hall, Hoxton, was never more needed than it is to-day. From the first Mr. Orsman has been the honorary superintendent, and he is now a veteran in the service. Having founded the work at a time when he held an appointment at the General Post Office, he devoted to it his spare hours; and when metropolitan improvements necessitated a removal from the original quarters, he was enabled, through his own energy and perseverance, to put up the present fine building at a cost of nearly £10,000. The hall and schoolroom seat 900, and there are other class-rooms; and on Sundays the building is quite filled at the Gospel services, Bible-classes, schools, &c.

In his day, the late C. H. Spurgeon looked upon Mr. Orsman as one of his own converts, and, in regard to his work, the great preacher remarked, "Our heart rejoices at every remembrance of him." It was a favourite work with the late Earl of Shaftesbury, who was accustomed at times to visit some of the poorest of the people in and about Golden Lane, when that once notorious locality was in its original condition. "God be blessed," wrote the Earl in his diary, after coming away from a Golden Lane meeting, "there are two or three men like him; and few things are more marvellous than to see what can be done by one man, whatever his social position, if he have but the love of Christ in his heart, and the love of our Lord to lead him on." The Marquis of Northampton is now the president; there are 150 voluntary helpers; the mission church has over 400 members.

"Just now there is need of special help," Mr. Orsman tells us, "for the winter season is at hand when heavy demands will be made upon our purse and energies. Every winter we supply above 20,000 meals to poor, ill-fed children, besides aid to cripples, sick and aged Christians, 1,000 Christmas dinners, &c." Mr. Orsman is an active member of the Council of the Ragged School Union, and in that capacity he was mainly instrumental in commencing the mission to drift children which is now being successfully carried on at a number of stations in London. His address is Milton House, Shacklewell Green, N.E.

Proposed Soldiers' Home at Mullingar.

THE garrison of Mullingar at present consists of one battalion of infantry, headquarters 6th Battalion Rifle Brigade, detachments of Royal Engineers, Army Service Corps, and Royal Army Medical Corps. Under the new Army Corps Scheme this will be maintained, and at present a soldier has no place of resort in the town, once he leaves the barrack, except the public-house.

In order to provide a counter-attraction to these surroundings, it is proposed to found a Soldiers' Home, under the management of Miss Sandes, who already has similar institutions in Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Waterford, Limerick, Ballincollig, Queenstown, and other garrison towns in Ireland and India; and who has consented to undertake the entire control and support of the institution, once it has been started. The Home would contain a temperance bar, where meals and non-intoxicating drinks of all kinds would be served; a reading room containing the leading periodicals; and, entirely separate from these, a room for Gospel meetings and temperance lectures.

A most suitable site, on the edge of the Fair Green and about 200 yards outside the barrack gates, has been offered for £200. It is estimated that in all £2,500 would be required, before December 31, 1902, to purchase this and erect a suitable building, including—in addition to the rooms already mentioned—a library, hot and cold water baths, and sleeping accommodation for men on furlough.

CONSTANCE CHARTERS, Hon. Secretary.

The Strangers' Rest.

THAT Ratcliff Highway no longer enjoys or deserves the reputation by which it was once known throughout the world is due in large measure to the missionary effort put forth among seamen. Among the centres from which the light of the Gospel is shed abroad to dispel the surrounding darkness, an honoured place must be given to the Strangers' Rest (163, St. George's Street, E.). The annual report submitted at the twenty-fifth annual meeting recently convened opened with an expression of thankfulness to God, that the sunshine of His love and faithfulness had, as hitherto, been enjoyed.

While congratulating the committee and helpers on what God had wrought through them in the past, the chairman (Rev. E. W. MATTHEWS) also pointed out that an extended field would be open to them in a few months through the removal of the base of operations of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society from Shadwell to the new "Jack's Palace."

On account of the absence, through indisposition, of Dr. A. M. Neatby, the secretarial statement was made by Mr. A. W. SEARLE, who rejoiced that the one aim and object of the Mission remained as it had ever been, the seeking of the glory of God through the salvation of men and women. The treasurer (Mr. MILTON HORNER) declared that his experience had been an education in confidence and trust in God. The income had amounted to £364 16s. 6d. and the expenditure to £321 10s. 5d.

While unable to speak of crowded meetings, Miss CLEEVER (resident deaconess) testified with gratitude that few weeks indeed had passed without the finding of lost sheep by the Good Shepherd. More and more it was being brought home that the most satisfactory results were the outcome of individual dealing with the men.

Among a number of typical cases referred to was that of an Eskimo who came and was converted, was accepted for service on the Moravian missionary ship Harmony, and is now witnessing for Christ among his own people. To a growing number the "Rest" is the only place associated with the idea of home life, and a resident in the neighbourhood, not connected with the work, had testified that the "Rest" is a great spiritual power among the seamen.

A helpful and stimulating address was given by Pastor James Stephens (Highgate), and Gospel solos were sung by Madame Annie Ryall.

Grace.

We have heard the words of Jesus,
They have calmed the troubled breast;
We have heard the joyful tidings,
And, believing, are at rest.

From the deadly chains of darkness,
He hath loosed us in His blood;
Given us right to life eternal—
Birth-right of the sons of God.

Truth, existing through the ages,
Slowly have we come to see—
Christ for us, complete redemption—
And the truth has made us free.

Oh, the patience of our Father,
Bearing with our years of crime!
Grieving we would not believe Him,
And be happy all the time.

After all, He has received us—
O what grace! forgiven sin,
Kiss of welcome, home of gladness,
And the feast of love within!

As we breathed in Satan's prison
Only airs of sin and death,
In the kingdom of our Father,
God, the Spirit, is our breath.

Here abiding, He transforms us,
Gives the resurrection might,
Shows us more and more His glory,
Just as we can bear the light.

God has laid a sure foundation,
Proved to bear the fiercest shock;
Here we stand, as God commands us,
Safe on Christ, the solid Rock.

Heads and Hearts.

I WANT you to read the touching little story related in 2 Kings iv. 18-37, which is one of those beautiful pictures of child-life which make the Bible so interesting to young people.

A little lad went out into the harvest-field where his father and the reapers were at work, and we can imagine how busy he would be "trying to help" in gleaning the golden sheaves, until suddenly he felt a pain—probably the result of sunstroke—which caused him to cry out, "My head, my head!"

I know a boy who went to school at the beginning of this term, and unwisely sat in the playground without a hat, on what proved to be almost the only really hot day of the autumn; and his experience was very much the same as that of the little Eastern lad, for, after a day or two in bed, he had to go home, and has missed the whole term as the result. Besides suffering from pains in the head, he is so weak at the knees that he can only walk a few yards at a time, so I am afraid it will mean a prolonged rest before he can go back to school.

Well, in the Bible story, the father of the lad said at once, "Carry him to his mother!" and I am sure that when she saw her little son being brought home she must have felt another sort of pain, which, if she had expressed it in words, would have led her to cry, "My heart, my heart!" for that is where her pain would be. So she nursed him "on her knees," and fondled him as only a mother can; but, alas, in spite of her loving care, we read that "at noon he died."

Then follows the description of how she sent for Elisha, the prophet, and in answer to his prayer, God restored the precious young life again.

What a sweet picture of a mother's love it is! And yet we need not travel to a far-off land to find others like it. Is there not one in your own home? When any illness or trouble comes to you, is there any hand that so tenderly cares for you and soothes your pain as "mother's"? Ah, we naturally think of our own pain or sorrow, which is very real to us; but do we think of the pain of heart that our dear one feels as she sees our suffering? Depend upon it that is equally real to her.

(1) One lesson we learn from the story is that childhood has its sorrows. You have no doubt found that out for yourselves; but I want you, when you realize them, not to forget the anxiety they also bring to those around you. Try to be as patient as possible, and ask God to teach you His lessons by any troubles that may thus come to you. It is very trying to mother and nurse when you are fretful and peevish, and although it may be very hard to be otherwise, yet Jesus will help you if you ask Him.

(2) Then, too, I am afraid we often pain our parents when we are quite well, by our wilfulness and tempers—when we have not even the excuse of being ill ourselves. Here, again, you need to seek help from on high to overcome all such temptations, and especially if you are a Christian. I remember, when I was seven years old, being very much surprised at a little girl of ten who one day got into a dreadful temper, although she professed to be one of Jesus' lambs, and I could not understand it at all; young as I was, I thought she was a strange sort of Christian. Of course she was very sorry for it after, but you see how you may exercise a bad influence over the children if you let Satan get the better of you in any way.

(3) You cannot fully realize how much love and concern your parents feel for you every day you live, nor how much they deny themselves of ease and comfort to make you happy. Therefore, "Honour thy father and thy mother." Always love and respect them, and never join with others in speaking disrespectfully about them behind their backs.

Mr. Moody knew a young man who had got on in the world, but whose parents were very poor; and one day a companion saw him speaking to his mother in the street. Next day his friend asked him who it was, and he was ashamed to say it was his mother; so he said, "Oh, that was my washerwoman!" How mean that was of him, wasn't it? There is a well-known book (perhaps I had better not mention its name) which tells of a mother and her little boy, and describes how devoted he was to her as a child, and always addressed her as "Darling." It is a true story, and the author was his mother; but when he grew up and went to college, and his friends chaffed him about it, I am sorry to say he denied a great deal of it because he was ashamed. That was not "honouring" his mother, of whom once he had been so proud, and I don't think he will ever grow to be a "great man" in character unless he mends his ways. True greatness can never come to us if we do not revere those who have done so much for us in our childhood.

(4) And if our mother's love is so great, what shall we say about the Love of Jesus? God says, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you" (Isa. lxvi. 13); "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him" (Psa. ciii. 13). Think of the pain Jesus bore for you. "He was wounded for our transgressions. He was bruised for our iniquities" (Isa. liii. 5). Jeremiah said, "Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me" (Lam. i. 12), but I think he referred to the Lord Jesus rather than to himself.

> We may not know, we cannot tell,
> What pains He had to bear;
> But we believe it was for us
> He hung and suffered there.

We have been stricken—not in the head with sunstroke, but in the heart with sin. Have you ever felt the pain there? "My heart, my heart!" we may well cry, and ask God to take that pain away. "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me."

(5) Lastly, think of the pain we give to God when we sin against Him. Since we should not like to pain our parents, if we knew it, how much more should we turn from that which gives pain to our Heavenly Father, and His Son, Jesus Christ, whose love is far greater and deeper than that of our dearest ones on earth. Think very seriously of this, dear boys and girls, and ask Him to forgive your wilfulness and your thoughtlessness, and to wash away your sins for His dear Name's sake.

Pictures as Teachers.—A writer in one of the photographic papers makes a shrewd remark as to the educative function of good pictures. He points out the rarity with which the child's brain is trained to differentiate between what is good and what is meretricious pictorially in line, colour, and form, and affirms that a boy whose literature is illustrated by Caton Woodville, Gordon Brown, &c., will soon learn to reject the coarser drawings in the halfpenny comic papers, and he will unconsciously be better for their healthier tone. This principle is of very wide application, and applies to even more important spheres than is here suggested. Good pictures have been known to expel bad pictures from a room. Assuredly good, healthy literature is the best antidote to bad in a household. Let parents, schoolmasters, and guardians of little children take the hint.

Our Fellowship (1 John i.).

WHAT a light must have shone upon the face of the Apostle as he wrote the opening words of this Epistle. It seemed as though he were back again in Galilee, listening to the voice which had called him in his early manhood, looking again into the face which was fairer than all other faces to him, handling those dear hands which had so often, by their touch, thrilled him. By these words we are brought into direct contact with the Christ of God, and amid all the questions by which we are assailed in these latter days we are able to stand with our feet upon a rock, as we consider this unwavering personal testimony to the Word of life. Constantly I go back in my own thinking to the strong testimony borne by the Apostles. I feel they could not have been deceived, and I rest upon their reiterated affirmations.

Notice, however, that the Apostle did not live back into the past. He said, "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ." It was a matter of constant personal experience. Probably it was even closer and more intimate as he penned these words in Ephesus than when he walked the highways of Palestine in company with the manifested glory of the Master.

The word fellowship is full of meaning. It is the word used in Luke v. 10 of the other Apostles who were partners with Simon; and in Philemon i. 7 of the partnership in tent-making between the Apostle Paul and his friend. It is employed also in 1 Cor. i. 9; x. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 14; Phil. i. 5; ii. 1; iii. 10, and in many other places. We gather, therefore, that it is possible for us to be in partnership with the Eternal God; we have, indeed, been called to this, and it may well be the daily inspiration of our life.

In his diary, George Müller tells us that this word first inspired him in his noble work; he felt that if his life was indeed a partnership between himself and God, he could step out into any path that was clearly defined for him by the Divine finger, drawing on the Divine resources. It is obvious that we must consult those with whom we are in partnership; that there must be community of plan as well as of resource. It is impossible for two to walk (or work) together unless they are agreed, and therefore it becomes us constantly to seek the Divine guidance.

It is obvious also that our character must be worthy of God. He will not lend Himself to fellowship with those who persistently love what He hates, and hate what He loves. There is no darkness in Him and there must be none in us.

In the closing paragraph of this chapter, and the first verse of the next, there are three couples of contrasted ideals, the first of which in each case begins with the words, If we say (6, 8, 10). In each of these three cases the Apostle says that the statement which is suggested is false. It is a lie to say that we have fellowship with God if we walk in darkness; the truth is not in us if we say that we have no sin; we make God a liar if we say that we have not sinned.

In the three contrasted statements we have the truth. If we walk in the light (v. 7). If we confess our sins (v. 9). If any man sin (ii. 1). These are the things upon which we ought to insist, for these only are the truth of God. It should not be forgotten that though we may be kept from known sin we are not therefore sinless. Think of our sins of omission—"the things that we ought to have done." —"to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin" How far our achievement falls short of God's ideal! Yet He will hold fellowship with us, because the blood of Jesus is constantly cleansing from the unconscious as well as the conscious evil, as the tear-water is always pouring over the eye of the miner and keeping it clean in the midst of his grimy toil.

Cholera and Starvation in Jerusalem.—On behalf of the Society for Relief of Persecuted Jews, Mrs. E. A. Finn (75, Brook Street, W.) writes that immediate relief is most urgently needed at Jerusalem. The cholera has prevailed in all the surrounding districts, and the mortality has been terrible. The Turkish authorities have imposed strict quarantine for several days. The peasantry have been thereby prevented from bringing food and fuel to market. Fuel, meat, and all provisions are excessively dear. The chronic state of starvation in which the poor Jews who cannot get work exist, and the pestilential atmosphere of their wretched abodes in the city, make it, humanly speaking, impossible for them to resist disease. The Society employs seventy men at Abraham's Vineyard, who are thus able to give bread to their families. The register of mothers cared for by the lady visitor contains over 1,500 names; these with their families make above 7,500 souls, many of them widows, many blind, some paralyzed, many diseased—all feeble and helpless.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, December 21.

Christmas Lesson (Luke ii. 8-20).

Golden Text (Luke ii. 11).

BETHLEHEM EPHRATAH—(1) foretold by the prophet (Micah v. 2) 700 years before as the birthplace of the Messiah; (2) had been the burial place of Rachel (Gen. xxxv. 19); (3) the home of Boaz, in whose fields Ruth had gleaned "the handfuls of corn let fall of purpose for her"; (4) "the city of David," where the youngest son of Jesse had fed his father's sheep and rescued a lamb from the mouth of the lion. The harp of the shepherd lad had often sounded across these same fields, for it was here that David learned the cunning which gained him the post of royal ministrel in the palace of King Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 16; xvii. 15-35).

The sheep needed for the Temple sacrifices were pastured in the fields of Bethlehem, and it seems meet that the shepherds who "kept watch" over these flocks were the men to receive the first "good tidings" of the birth of the "Lamb without blemish, and without spot."

Who were the Shepherds?

Peasants, doing lowly duties in a humble position, but men whose hearts were open to receive the revelations of God. Confident in faith. Alert in action. Ready in testimony. They heard, believed, obeyed. Sought the Saviour till they found Him, then proclaimed the good news abroad, the message given them; and went back to their common duties glorifying and praising God.

In the Manger at Bethlehem.

What could the shepherds have seen?
- The Infant Messiah (John i. 41).
- The promised King (Matt. i. 23).
- The paschal Lamb (John xiii. 1).
- The Substitute (Gen. xxii. 8).
- The Consolation of Israel (Luke ii. 25).

What did the angels see?
- The Son of God (Heb. i. 5, 6).
- The King of Glory (Psa. xxiv. 10).
- The Light of the world (John i. 4).
- The Light of heaven (Rev. xxi. 23).
- The Eternal Life (1 John i. 2).
- King of kings (Rev. xvii. 14).
- Exalted (Acts ii. 33-35, v. 31).
- Coming in glory (Matt. xxvi. 64).

What can we see?
- Jesus, my Saviour (Matt. i. 21).
- The Propitiation for me (Luke xviii. 13).
- In type (Gen. iv. 4).
- On Calvary (John xix. 30).
- In the Throne (Rev. iii. 21).
- My Substitute (Heb. ix. 12-14).
- Jehovah-tsidkenu (Rom. iii. 22).
- My Advocate (1 John ii. 1).
- Emmanuel, God with us.

Lessons.

1. The shepherds "came with haste" to find Jesus, the angels needed not to plead with them, or reason, or drive or coax them. "Ye will not" (John v. 40).

2. God gave the best Gift He had in heaven that Christmas Day. Have we given Him our best gift to-day? Love (Matt. xxii. 37), for "God so loved" (John iii. 16).

3. Would Jesus be a welcome Guest at our Christmas party? He was invited to a marriage feast, and a tax-collector's dinner. What blessing did he leave there? (John ii. 11; Luke v. 32.) Jesus went as a Guest into the house of Zaccheus, with what result? (Luke xix. 6, 10.) Zaccheus "received Him joyfully."

"Come in, come in, Lord Jesus!
My glorious Guest to be."

4. The shepherds could not understand all the angels meant, but they could believe and trust; and Jesus said, "The Spirit of truth will guide you into all truth" (John xvi. 13).

A CONDESCENDING SAVIOUR.

Some years ago an English Princess was visiting the Bermudas. The islanders, both rich and poor, were delighted at the presence of Royalty, and flocked on all possible occasions to do her honour. One day, as the Princess was walking alone in a country district, she stopped at a cottage and asked for a glass of water. The housewife, not knowing her visitor, replied that she was busy, ironing a shirt for her husband, who was dressing, to attend a reception by the Queen's daughter. The Princess answered that she would do the ironing if the water could be fetched; and on that understanding the woman went to the well, leaving the Princess to finish the ironing of the shirt. Is not the graciousness of the earthly Princess a picture of the condescension of the Prince of Peace? In heralding Him, the angel said, "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people (v. 10).

PRAISE GOD THE LORD.

In some parts of the Alps it is not unusual for the shepherds to use their famous horns, for a purpose other than that of making the ordinary calls. When the sun is setting, a shepherd, on a peak, may put the horn to his mouth and shout, "Praise God the Lord." The message rings through the mountains, and is re-echoed from the neighbouring heights. Another shepherd will respond with the same words, and the shout of triumph, "Praise God the Lord," may pass from mountain to mountain, for perhaps a quarter of an hour during the period of sunset. If in their happy surroundings, the Alpine shepherds can shout for joy, small wonder if the shepherds of Bethlehem returned from seeing the Saviour, glorifying and praising God, even as the host had said, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward man" (vv 14-20).

MAKING HASTE IN GOD'S SERVICE.

A minister, speaking recently at a public meeting, referred to a deacon he had known while in a country pastorate. He was a worthy man, but quite devoid of enthusiasm in religious matters. When, however, a Parliamentary election was pending, he busily canvassed the whole district, and, on the day of the poll, drove a number of electors from a neighbouring village. In political affairs the deacon was filled with excitement, while in religious matters he displayed no enthusiasm whatever. To visit the polling booth he placed his trap at the disposal of all the villagers, though it never occurred to him to assist the old folk to God's house. If we were but to place some of our muscular or business enthusiasm at God's service, His work would make more progress. When the Lord had made known the good tidings to the shepherds, they came with haste and found Mary and Joseph and the babe lying in a manger (v. 16).

THE MOUTH FILLED WITH PRAISE.

When William Carey was in India, one of his most notable converts was a "holy" man of Calcutta, who had not spoken a word for four years. His self-imposed silence was on account of a vow he had taken, not to open his mouth. Dr. Carey induced him to read some tracts on Christianity, and he was persuaded to renounce his vow and make use of his God-given speech. When we have been led to Christ, and have seen Him, then it is we should find our voices. The shepherds, when they had seen the infant Jesus, made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning the child. And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds (vv. 17 and 18).

Prayer for Revival.

THE spirit of grace and supplication was manifested at the Noon Meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Monday last. The announced speaker was precluded from attending, but the subject of Prayer for Revival, particularly in view of Rev. Dr. Torrey's forthcoming mission at Mildmay Conference Hall, evidently filled many minds.

As several brethren—among others, Pastors Fuller Gooch and Maycock, Messrs. Henry Varley and Charles Cook—led in prayer, or recounted personal experiences illustrative of the power of intercession, both preliminary to, and during seasons of revival, the meeting was touched as with the fore-glow of coming blessing. A variety of helpful thoughts found expression. Some of these may be summarized as follows: (1) We must guard against the hurrying and scurrying tendencies of the day, which tend to interfere with the duty of prayerful preparation for service. (2) There should be a marked increase in private prayer. Records of Revival show how great is the spiritual gain to evangelism which comes from the continued supplication of the Lord's people. (3) A man with a message is important, but we must beware of the danger of looking to men and depending on human ability instead of waiting on the Lord. Our hope is in God, and the first step towards Revival is to arouse the Church to prayer.

Mr. John Elliott.—The numerous friends of Mr. John Elliott will rejoice that he has sufficiently recovered from his protracted illness to be able to resume in part his much-loved work of preaching the Gospel. He has held meetings in Torquay, Paignton, &c.; but not having regained full strength his doctor advises him to preach "as little as possible."

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

DUBLIN.

THE mission in Dublin of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry and Mr. T. Armon Jones continued its course with results that were full of encouragement. The Dublin Express said:—"The meetings of the United Temperance Crusade in this city continue to attract large numbers of people. The intense earnestness and wonderful fluency of language which are characteristic of the speaker, as well as the care with which his various statements of facts are prepared and given to the audience, are having their effect, and at every meeting pledges are being signed."

A correspondent writes: "Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones conducted a great meeting in the Metropolitan Hall on December 1. On the following day two meetings were held at Kingstown. The Town Hall was crowded at the afternoon meeting, and in the evening there was not sufficient accommodation for all those who came. Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones were at their best, and did yeoman service for the cause in this important township. It was delightful to see all the local Protestant clergy on the platform. On the Wednesday evening a great meeting was held in the Town Hall, Rathmines. The attendance was so large that the doors had to be closed. Few will ever forget Dr. Henry's address on that occasion. It was a marvellous delivery, and is bound to have a far-reaching effect for good as to the Scriptural aspect of the temperance question. The mission fittingly concluded on Thursday evening in the Metropolitan Hall, where Dr. Henry gave his famous lecture on the 'Future of the Anglo-Saxon Race.' Mr. Jones rendered good service by his inspiring singing. So concluded a most successful campaign against the world's foe, strong drink.

"The committee are deeply grateful to Dr. Henry and Mr. Jones for their most efficient services. They carry with them the affection of the people, and earnest prayer for God's continued blessing upon their work. This is Dr. Henry's second visit to Dublin, and his return to our city will be hailed with delight when he finds it convenient to visit us again. He is a most powerful advocate of total abstinence, with whom it is a delight and privilege to work."

WORCESTER.

Following Dublin came an important meeting at Holyhead, and a mission at Worcester, where, on arriving, a children's meeting was held, and subsequently Dr. Henry spoke words of stimulus and wise counsel to assembled workers. The visit of the missioners was timely, temperance work being beset by many difficulties. On Sabbath last a good beginning was made, the addresses being of an awakening character. A correspondent writes:—"The meetings were most encouraging considering the low state of abstinence sentiment in the city. If, as we heartily believe, the gatherings continue to grow, an important outcome will doubtless be the formation of a strong Temperance Society, thus marking an epoch in Worcester's history. The mission continues until December 16."

Simultaneous Mission in Africa. — An effort is being made to arrange special services in connection with all the Protestant missions working in Central and South Africa. In addition to such evangelistic services as may be carried on at different times in connection with the various missionary societies, it is proposed to have a great Simultaneous Mission by all the societies jointly, to take place about Christmas of the present year. The missionaries request prayer that the outcome of the meetings may be a great reviving of God's work throughout the whole of British Central and South Africa.

Christmas Appeals.

MANY appeals are reaching us from those who labour among the poor, and who desire during the Christmas season to provide help and cheer for the suffering and needy. The distress which prevails is keen and far-reaching; not for years, perhaps, has there been so much want, following on lack of employment. We, therefore, heartily commend these appeals—which pressure upon our space compels us to state in brief terms—to the generosity of our readers.

Rev. W. J. Ferrar, St. Philip's Vicarage, Bethnal Green, E., hopes to provide Christmas treats and afford relief to the aged poor.

Miss Child, of the "Welcome Home for Sailors," Canning Town, E., will again minister to the needs of seamen and their wives and children, and seeks aid in her efforts.

Mr. T. Miller, 104, Well Street, Hackney, hon. superintendent of Ashley Grove Mission, Bethnal Green, E., appeals on behalf of the needy in a poverty-stricken district.

Mr. William T. Russell, 11, Manor Place, Paddington Green, W., is arranging free meals for the poor, and gifts to the aged infirm in connection with John Street Chapel, Edgware Road, W.

Mr. Thos. Arnold (9, Princes Square, Kennington Park Road, S.E.), Hon. Sec. of the South London Mission, pleads for help to give a good Christmas dinner to some of the very poor, as in past years.

At Kent Street Ragged Children's Mission, S.E., help is sought that the destitute children of the district may be provided with a Christmas dinner: Hon Sec, Mr. John T. Smith, 459, Old Kent Road, London, S.E.

At Richmond Street Mission, Walworth, S.E., Christmas dinners are to be distributed to large numbers of the poor in this needy district. Hon. Sec., Mr. J. W. Leonard, 1, Sainfoin Road, Upper Tooting, S.W.

Mr. J. Dix Lewis, Penrhyn, Hornsey Lane, N., pleads for Sermon Lane Mission, E., where much good work is carried on. Striking features are dinners for "advertising boardmen," and the distribution of soup.

Mr. Marshall Broomhall, hon. superintendent, writes on behalf of Matthias Road Wesleyan Mission, Stoke Newington, N., where Christmas dinners are to be distributed. There is much want in the district. Address, 45, Newington Green, N.

At Canning town, E., where terrible destitution prevails among the poor, free meals are being given twice a week, and it is intended to continue them if funds are forthcoming: Hon. Supt., Mr. Alex. Smith, 41, Bethel Avenue, Canning Town, E.

Rev. George Freeman, of Westbourne Grove Chapel, writes that "the number of men out of employment is appalling." For these, their wives and children, and especially for poor cripples Mr. Freeman appeals. Address, 49, Cornwall Road, W.

At Ham Yard Soup Kitchen and Hospice about 1,000 families are provided with Christmas dinners; coal tickets are also distributed, and penny dinners provided. The superintendent is Mr. W. Stevens, Ham Yard, Great Windmill Street, Piccadilly Circus, W.

The Congregational Church, Bethnal Green Road, E., is in the midst of a densely populated working class district, where there is much distress. Christmas dinners are to be given to the neediest. Church secretary, Mr. D. Dear, 91, Victoria Park Road, N.E.

Mr. John Soames, of Howard Street Gospel Mission, Wandsworth Road, S.W., writes:—"For many years past we have been enabled to provide thousands of free meals, and have assisted hundreds of distressing cases." It is hoped to continue the good work.

Free breakfasts and Christmas dinners are given in connection with Gospel meetings by the Spitalfields Lodging-House Band. Mr. E. J. Hudson (Hon. Secretary, Free Meals Fund), 42A, Grand Parade, Harringay, N., appeals for help in order that the work may be maintained.

Mr. Thomas Fagg (136, Pentonville Road, N.) writes on behalf of Fox Court Ragged School and Mission:—"Much poverty and distress prevail amongst the families associated with the Mission. A large proportion is due to sickness and death amongst the bread winners."

Rev. Joseph Olphert, who has charge of the Wesleyan Mission at Deptford, S.E., during Rev. J. Gregory Mantle's absence in India, has to deal with many cases of acute distress. Gifts of blankets, clothes, or money may be addressed to Mr. Olphert, 58, Lewisham Park, S.E.

The "Home Visiting Work" (late Spitalfields Gospel Mission, E.), conducted by Mr. James Sharpless, desires to assist the poor with bread and groceries, and other suitable gifts. Preference is given to widows and mothers with young children. Address, 364, Monega Road, Manor Park, E.

Mr. William Wheatley, St. Giles' Christian Mission, and his helpers hope to distribute Christmas dinners, food, firing, and clothing to the deserving poor, without permitting any portion of their many-sided mission work to suffer in any of its branches. Address, 4, Ampton Street, Regent Square, W.C.

The work of the London City Mission is familiar to our readers. Mr. Frank A. Bevan writes:—"The missionaries, by their spiritual influence, do much to restrain the forces of evil, and to maintain peace and morality in the City. We have now 460 of these earnest-minded devoted men at work in London." Office, Bridewell Place, E.C.

The Gifford Hall Mission, Gifford Street, Caledonian Road, N.E., Officers and Teachers appeal for funds to distribute dinners to poor recipients at their own homes, to give 900 children a New Year's tea, and to provide creature comforts for the aged sick poor. Address, Mr. H. W. Whittenbury, 59, Holloway Road, N.

The friends at the Scandinavian Sailors' Home, Poplar, E., seek liberal aid for their Christmas fund "owing to unparalleled depression in the shipping trade." Address, Mrs. A. Welin, as above.

Meals are to be given to the poor at Camberwell Mission and Ragged Schools. "The crippled and afflicted children cannot be overlooked nor the aged and infirm neglected." Hon. Sec., Mr. Arthur H. Ward, 59, Arodene Road, Brixton Hill, S.W.

Mr. J. A. Groom writes:—"It has been the custom for many years for the Watercress and Flower Girls' Christian Mission to provide materials for a Christmas dinner, at their own homes, to the deserving poor. At the present moment 1,500 destitute but deserving families are urgently needing attention." Address: 8, Sekforde Street, Clerkenwell, E.C.

Rev. D. M. Cameron (32, Larkhall Rise, Clapham) appeals on behalf of the suffering poor in the vicinity of Union Tabernacle, Wandsworth Road, S.W. "There are numbers of the aged poor to whom blankets and clothing would be a great boon, and there are hard-working people whom we supply, at their own homes, with Christmas dinners."

The Ragged School Union touches 100,000 of the people of London, being a proportion of one in sixty. Mr. John Kirk, secretary, 32, John Street, Theobald's Road, W.C., writes:—"May I appeal to the 'fifty-nine' not to forget, in their preparations, the 'sixtieth,' who depends on them for any 'good time' that may come to him this Christmas?"

Rev. D. J. Rounsefell (9, Kempsford Road, Kennington, S.E.) writes:—"For several years the Waterloo Road Mission has undertaken to provide a substantial meal for many poor families at Christmastide. As the work at the Victoria Theatre has broadened, the call for help comes with increasing volume from those who are struggling with destitution."

At Percy Mission Hall, Bermondsey, S.E., under the direction of Madame Annie Ryall and her husband, it is customary to give about seventy families materials for a dinner for Christmas Day. "This year the severe weather and bad state of trade will lead to an innundation of applicants, and help will be gratefully acknowledged by Mr. W. Bustin, 126, Jamaica Road, S.E.

The North-East London Gospel Mission has for more than thirty years, under the care of Mr. William Chorley, maintained labours that are both evangelistic and philanthropic, specially seeking to help the deserving poor. Address, 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.

An earnest appeal is made by the deacons and workers of Shoreditch Tabernacle, Hackney Road, E., on behalf of the Christmas dinner fund. For many years Pastor Cuff himself distributed bread and beef to the poor and needy of Shoreditch and Bethnal Green, while Mrs. Cuff has supplemented the good work by the distribution of warm clothing. This Christmas Mr. Cuff will be away through ill-health, and communications should be sent to his daughter, Mrs. S. Miller, at the Tabernacle.

"In School and Playground."—After reading In School and Playground, by G. E. Morgan, M.A. (1s., 2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott), Rev. Dr. Alexander Whyte says: "It will make a capital Christmas present for a thoughtful boy. The book cannot fail to be fruitful." Another reviewer writes: "The author is charmingly original, and draws upon his own life and experience for an endless supply of fresh incidents and illustrations."

Cairo Soldiers' Home.—Many readers will like to know that the work among the soldiers in our homes in Gibraltar and Cairo prospers. There have been many and great difficulties (Eph. vi. 12), but God has been with us, and in every case has given deliverance. If the Lord will, I go to Cairo in January, and have to meet the last claims for building and alterations, to do which I shall need £500, with, in addition, about £200 for furnishing and necessary expenses. Would some of the servants of God to whom He has entrusted the "silver and the gold" help me to meet these claims? I should be so grateful.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Rev. Jesse Mayo at Hornsea.

A HAPPY and successful mission has been conducted at Hornsea, under the auspices of the Free Church Council, by Rev. Jesse Mayo. A good number professed conversion. God richly blessed the powerful appeals made by the missioner to saint and sinner. The Bible readings held every afternoon were seasons of rich blessing, and were largely attended. The spiritual uplift will long be felt by all the churches interested.

W. Parker, Secretary.

The "Edinburgh Castle," E.

A month's services has just been concluded by Mr. J. S. Harrison at the "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E. For many years past Mr. Harrison has come to us annually, and his visits have always been looked forward to with expectancy. In spite of the very inclement weather on the last Sunday, good audiences attended to listen to his final messages. They were seasons of help both to the Lord's people and to the unsaved. We pray that the Lord's richest blessing may accompany His servant." N.

In Dartmoor Prison.

The fourth annual mission was recently brought to a close in H.M. Convict Prison, Dartmoor. Every day straight, manly talks and Gospel solos were given by Mr. Arthur Hanson, of the Church Army. Ninety men were personally interviewed by the missioner. There was rapt attention in the services, as a complete surrender to Christ was asked for. It was beautiful to hear the men joining in the refrain of the solos, "Moment by moment," and others. Many of the convicts were in tears as the evangelist proclaimed the Gospel message.

Rev. J. Lyall in New Zealand.

"The wind-up of the Inter-denominational Mission at Napier, conducted by Rev. Jas. Lyall, was," says The Outlook, "of a most blessed nature. There were large congregations, and increased numbers of decisions for Christ. The closing night was characterized by holy enthusiasm amongst the believers, and increased interest amongst the unconverted. The large theatre was packed, and many blessed testimonies to answered prayer were given by young and old, the majority having been brought to the knowledge of the truth during the mission. Some 350 or more adults and children have professed conversion, and a large number of Christians have consecrated their lives to God. This is mighty work in proverbially hard Napier. The missioner could command large attendances for many nights to come, but moves on to Gisborne for a similar mission."

Adelaide Simultaneous Mission.

Recalling the Simultaneous Mission at Adelaide, South Australia (of which we have given particulars), Rev. Charles Bright, president of the mission, writes:—"The mission was a work of God. Drunkards, gamblers, and evil workers were led to Christ, the careless and indifferent startled out of their apathy and transformed into earnest men and women. Hundreds of backsliders were restored to the truth. Multitudes, to whom Christianity was little more than a name, were changed into living witnesses for its truth, testifying that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation. Upwards of seventeen hundred people, young and old, business men and artizans, larrikins and collegians, girls and matrons, respectable citizens and fallen outcasts, accepted Christ as their Saviour. In some instances whole families professed faith in Jesus, and abodes that once were dens of misery are now homes of peace and joy.

"Arrangements were made for twenty-two centres. All the town halls and institutes available were engaged. In some cases tents were erected for the purpose with a seating capacity for 500 and 1,000 people. In a few cases where no hall could be obtained, a local church was used. In all these centres there was a good choir, with a band of earnest workers to help in the after-meeting. The missioners were very different in many respects, but they were one in their work, and animated by the sole desire to bring men to Christ.

"At the final meeting it is estimated that over 5,000 persons were present, and if double that number could have been accommodated the place would have been filled. As it was, as on the other nights, thousands could not obtain admission. For two hours a great crowd stood in the drenching rain, hoping to get into the after-meeting."

Mr. H. Stafford Smith at Manchester.

In connection with the Upper Moss Lane Mission, Hulme, a fortnight's mission by Mr. Stafford Smith, of the Evangelization Society, has been held. For three successive Sundays the Mission Hall was crowded, and at the intervening week-night services there were good attendances. Mr. Smith expounds the Gospel very simply and clearly, yet most earnestly and forcibly, compelling the attention of every hearer. Most blessed results have attended these services—believers were confirmed in the faith, several backsliders reclaimed, and sinners brought to the Lord. A pleasing fact was that among the most energetic workers were several who had given their hearts to the Saviour during Mr. Smith's previous visit, some five or six years ago; this being his third mission at Upper Moss Lane.

Mr. Smith did not forget the children, for he arranged a series of meetings, at which he trained them by his systematic method of Bible teaching; and on one Sunday afternoon, he spoke at a public demonstration to a crowded audience. All were delighted at the wonderful amount of Scriptural knowledge gained by the young people in four hours' training. Mr. Smith's visit will long be remembered with deep gratitude. H. F. Dorrington, Hon. Sec.

Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Thetford.

The Free Church Council Mission recently held by Mr. R. S. Bradbrook has been fruitful in its results, a large number of some of the most promising young men and women of the churches being brought to decision for Christ.

For some time past the Council has been doing a quiet solid work among the churches, and the visit of the missioner was therefore looked forward to with earnest hope. We have not been disappointed, for seldom has the town been so moved, religiously. In addition to the services in the Oddfellows' Hall, arranged by the Council, Mr. Bradbrook has during the Sundays occupied the pulpits of all the Free Churches, preaching and singing the Gospel with profit to all. The afternoon Bible-readings and meetings for Christians have been a source of spiritual help and instruction, as was shown by personal testimony and correspondence.

At the close of the Mission the Council arranged a special meeting for the converts, seventy-three of whom accepted the invitation and were afterwards addressed by the missioner and the various ministers, many grateful testimonies being given by those brought to the Lord. As a Council we feel greatly indebted to our brother for the help and encouragement he has been to us all in the Free Churches of Thetford.

(Rev.) W. Fitch, Hon. Sec. of Council.

The Evangelization Society.

Many of our friends know that the Evangelization Society has three centres—London, Glasgow, and Liverpool. From these centres about 140 men are sent forth to preach every Lord's Day, each man being required to use "great plainness of speech" in declaring lovingly and faithfully the Gospel of God's grace.

Quite recently an able evangelist was introduced to a sphere of service for a fortnight, by three influential gentlemen who were all taking a lively interest in the work. After a most disappointing opening on the Sunday, he found organized opposition on the Monday to such an extent that a number of rough youths alone presented themselves in the Public Hall; they, by their language and behaviour made it impossible for any adult to venture. After much patience the preacher was obliged to clear the hall and lock the door, and try again. He then took great delight in visiting every house in the place, and by the second Sunday was able to hold two meetings, attended by over sixty persons in all. This is mentioned because it is not to be supposed that the Society only goes to those places where it can begin work under favourable circumstances. John Wood.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison at Filey.

A tidal wave of spiritual power has come over the town of Filey. The year 1902 must be an historic year. We have had calamity after calamity and disaster after disaster, until in the month of September last Filey was one of the saddest towns in the nation.

Amid greatest discouragement we have kept to our spiritual work. At times we have had but few helpers and many hinderers. However, Sunday after Sunday a large congregation has gathered in our beautiful house of prayer and listened to the burning truths of the Gospel. After the visitors left the town this year our people gathered together for prayer. The spirit of prayer came upon the people, and they had "a mind to work." We have had as many as ten and eleven cottage prayer-meetings in different parts of the town at the same time, and then each prayer company sang their way to a centre, where an open-air service was held. As many as 500 people have worshipped in the open air, and many people have given themselves to the Lord.

Now, Mr. and Mrs. A. Harrison came in faith, simplicity, and power. The Filey people loved them from the first, and worked with them in every way. The congregations were large, and the beautiful building packed both on Sundays and week-days. The services have been full of the power of God, and over 200 souls have decided for Christ. We have not had an inquiry-room, but every convert has come boldly forward to the communion rail. There have been many striking and interesting cases of blessing.

The open-air missions have been a splendid success. The workers visited the public-houses and sang the praises of God with all their might. We have sold and given about 1,500 of the "Evangelistic Hymn Book," by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, and this little book has contributed very largely to the success of our open-air missions and week-day services. The mission has been a mightily spiritual move. We give God the glory, and pray for his richest blessing to abide with the evangelists. (Rev.) Isaiah Potts.

Manchester City Mission.

Newton Heath.

A fifteen days' mission (which was extended for another four days) has been held at the Manchester City Mission Hall, Barker Street, Newton Heath. For months previous we had evidences of the hand of God upon us both in the visitation and also in the Gospel services, so that the mission was a time of reaping. Mr. Joseph Whiting, of the Evangelization Society, was the missioner. Nearly every house in the district was visited by missionaries, deaconess, and workers. Twelve men specially directed their attention to the "street corner" men and those leaving the public-houses on Sunday afternoons. Many were thus induced to attend the services.

A good number of workers conducted open-air meetings each evening, and many people who came out of their houses to listen followed on to the mission hall, including some who had not been in a place of worship for years. The pointed and pathetic appeals of the preacher resulted in seventy people entering the inquiry room. Several dinner-hour meetings were held at various workshops. The whole district seems to have been aroused. Mr. Ernest Matthews gave an inspiring address to the converts and workers; 120 attended the service, and were greatly benefited.

A number of the converts confess to having been under conviction for weeks. One person said: "I have been so miserable, that every time a knock came at my door I was wishing it was the missionary or deaconess, so that I might tell them how anxious I was to know Jesus as my Saviour." She now enjoys the peace of God. The young men have decided to celebrate their conversion by providing 100 respectable poor people with a good treat at Christmas. To God be all the glory! Edward Benson, Missionary.
Elizabeth Benson, Deaconess.

Miles Platting.

We have just concluded a fifteen days' mission, conducted by Mr. Charles Noakes, of the Evangelization Society, at the Shaftesbury Institute, Miles Platting. It has been attended by very encouraging results, many have been led to appropriate the blessing of pardon, while Christians have been much helped. Night after night we had a march through the streets of the district, singing and preaching the Gospel, and inviting the people to the indoor meetings. As the days passed the meetings increased in number and interest; young men and women decided for Christ, and in some cases father and mother, son and daughter were blessed.

We were much helped by the missionaries and deaconesses of the City Mission staff, and also by the workers and friends from Tipping Street, Ardwick, where Mr. Noakes had conducted a mission a few weeks previously. We bless the Lord for the continuance of His saving power manifested in our midst.

Peter Paterson, Missionary.

Mr. Newton Jones has just concluded a week's mission at the Wesleyan Chapel, Great Yarmouth. The meetings were deeply spiritual. In response to an appeal about one hundred boys signed an anti-tobacco pledge.

Colonel R. F. Taylor and Mr. B. H. Angel, of Guernsey, have just concluded a sixteen-days' mission at the Railway Mission Hall, College Park, Willesden Junction, N.W. Much blessing has followed the faithful and earnest preaching of God's Word. Several confessed Christ, and believers were blessed. Miss E. Angel gave valuable help with her Gospel singing. A. Franck, Superintendent.

At the Baptist Church, Maldon, Essex, a fifteen days' mission has been conducted by Mr. J. H. Cooke, of the Evangelization Society, with very encouraging results. Good congregations assembled every night, and on Sundays the chapel was filled. God's people have been very much helped by Mr. Cooke's Bible readings, which were very largely attended. Many professed faith in Christ.

George Sneesby, Pastor.

In connection with the Swansea Y.M.C.A. lantern lectures have been held in the open air on Sunday evenings. Hundreds have gathered to listen, and it is hoped to continue the services during the winter.

Mr. Henry Thorne has conducted a six days' mission at St. John's Methodist Free Church, Hollinwood, November 29-December 4. A deeper spiritual interest was aroused among believers, and there were many cases of blessing among the unconverted.

At the Free Methodist Church, Southville, Bristol, a mission by Mr. James Shields, of the Evangelization Society, has been concluded, with very satisfactory results. There are hopeful cases of decision, and an evidence of quickened life and interest on the part of the Church members. Mr. Shields' preaching was very earnest and spiritual. The Church has very appreciative remembrance of his good work.

At Newton St. Boswells (under the auspices of the Railway Mission) Miss Glover, of Edinburgh, recently conducted services. Each Sabbath evening the hall was packed, and on the week nights the attendances were good. The message was delivered each night with remarkable clearness and much power. We rejoice that some precious souls found peace, and pray that spiritual interest will deepen and many more yield their hearts to our Lord. H. S. G.

In the eight days' evangelistic services held at Howard Street Gospel Mission, Wandsworth Road, S.W., which concluded on November 23, blessing was experienced, many being deeply touched by the earnest addresses delivered, and several seekers being pointed to Christ. One was a poor woman who said she had been a terrible drunkard. Among those who took part were Messrs. Wm. Vale, John Soames, J. Dale, Rev. R. Copp, and other friends.

On Saturday evening last Mr. Leonard Weaver commenced a sixteen days' mission at Barnsbury Chapel, N. On the Lord's Day Mr. Weaver conducted the services in the afternoon, when a good congregation gathered, and in the evening. It was most cheering and encouraging to see the people gather in such large numbers—many from good distances. Mr. Beaton and the North London choir are assisting Mr. Weaver. It was very cheering to see old Barnsbury Chapel so full of earnest and happy faces throughout the entire service. J. H.

Under the auspices of the Abergavenny Y.M.C.A., a mission of eight days' duration has been held, conducted by Captain Baring. The meetings were held in the Assembly Hall of the Association, in Frogmore Street, and the last meeting, on Sunday evening last, in the Town Hall, when hundreds of people assembled to hear the Word. Christians of all denominations unite to testify to the blessing received under the ministry of God's servant, while many hitherto indifferent ones will praise God for the powerful exposition of His truth which has made them free. J. O.

During the month of November Mr. John T. Leafe held a seventeen days' mission at Northcote Street Baptist Chapel, Stockton-on-Tees. The attendances were very good, and numbers, both of adults and young people, were led to decision. The children were greatly impressed with their service, and many of them will live to bless the day that they became soldiers of Christ. The mission will be remembered for long years to come, and homes and duties once neglected will be radiant with the glory of God, because of the new life received during the Mission. F. B.

An encouraging and fruitful eight days' mission has been conducted in Hankin Street Presbyterian Mission, Liverpool, by Mr. Henry Jacob (of the Evangelization Society). The missioner preached the Gospel with power and freshness, and there were hearty responses to his appeal for immediate decision for Christ. Some who have not been in the habit of attending any place of worship have been reached; and remarkable cases of conversion have taken place. At the closing meeting an opportunity was given for testimony, and old and young for the first time raised their thankful voice in the house of God. We praise God for the evangelist's visit, and our prayers follow him.

James Kirkpatrick, Missionary.

A fortnight's mission held in the Baptist Chapel, Upper Stratton, Wilts, conducted by Mr. H. F. Pouncey, of the Evangelization Society, was concluded on Sunday, November 23. The mission proved one of great blessing to the church, and will long be remembered with gratitude to God. The Word was listened to with deep interest, and we believe great good will result therefrom. Some who seldom visited the house of God yielded themselves to Him, and others, who had long been undecided, came out fully. Mr. Pouncey gave an address to Christian workers which was much appreciated, and his visits to the sick were richly blessed.

A. N. Taylor, Senior Deacon.
J. Usher, Church Secretary.

The ten days' mission lately concluded by Mr. R. S. Bradbrook at Heath Street Chapel, Crewe, has been attended with many indications of blessing and encouragement. Having known the missioner for some years as a soul-winner, and having had the pleasure of his co-operation in previous missions, his visit to Crewe was anticipated with no small degree of interest both by myself and the church officials. The many letters received by the evangelist from those who have received blessing amply testify to the good work accomplished. A very large number of the young people of the Sunday-school and Bible-classes were dealt with as inquirers, and preparations are being made for conserving these happy results of the mision.

G. P. Clarke, Supt. Minister.

A fifteen days' mission has just been held in the Elm Grove Free Church, Hayling, by Mr. A. W. Smart, of the Evangelization Society. The meetings were well attended. There were some striking cases of blessing; after many months of prayer, God answered. He opened the blind eyes of sinners and revealed Jesus as their Saviour. They are now rejoicing in the finished work of Christ, their Redeemer. The Church, too, was quickened. Many Christians were able to testify publicly of the good they had received. F. J. J.

Messrs. Pepler and Edwards have concluded a ten days' mission at Radstock, Somerset. A correspondent writes to the effect that many have passed through the inquiry room. "Among others, a young man gave his heart to God, and immediately requested prayer for four other young men. One night these four rose from their seats and sought Christ. Another man, a great drunkard, and his wife were so deeply convicted in the meetings that they could find no rest, and at a late hour went to the house where the evangelists were staying and gave themselves to God. Among the first to volunteer was an old man of seventy-two, who, leaning on the arm of a worker, made his way to the inquiry room. Great was his praise when he realized that his sins were forgiven. A noteworthy feature was the service for men only, on the second Sunday afternoon, when Mr. Pepler addressed a large crowd, giving a character sketch of Richard Weaver. Many of the colliers were moved to tears. God is working mightily."

Evangelists' Engagements.

 This column is intended for Missions of some days' duration, rather than for engagements of a single day. The evangelists ask prayer for their respective missions.

Obituary.

Rev. H. E. L. Newbery.

A MISSIONARY of much promise, Rev. H. E. L. Newbery, M.A., of the C.M.S., Palamcotta, South India, passed to his rest on Nov. 19. After a distinguished career at Cambridge Mr. Newbery had served as curate at Widnes, and later at Emmanuel Church, Everton, Liverpool, proceeding to India on Jan. 4, 1901. He had just completed his final language examination, and was looking forward to commencing itinerating work among the natives in the Tinnevelly district. His sudden death (from cholera) came as a great shock to friends at home, who had anticipated for him a long career of usefulness in the Lord's service. Much sympathy has been expressed at Everton; Mr. Newbery had kept in touch with his old church, sending a monthly letter to the parish magazine, and being esteemed by many who regarded him with the affection of personal friends.

Mr. James Todd (Dublin).

On Tuesday morning last week, in the presence of a large number of Christian friends, the remains of James Todd, a brother in Christ, known and beloved by many, was laid to rest in Mount Jerome Cemetery, Dublin.

He was born in Kilmarnock, Scotland, in the year 1829, was converted at the age of twelve, and from then till the end he ever sought to live unto God. He came to reside in Dublin about thirty-six years ago, and at once became engaged in Christian work, especially among soldiers and police. With the hearty co-operation of his friend and brother in the Lord, Francis Penrose, he began regular weekly meetings for these men in the rooms, 54, Upper Sackville Street, which have continued to the present. God has graciously given much blessing, both in the salvation of sinners and in help to Christian men. Having an earnest desire for the well-being of God's people, he convened in the same rooms six to eight conferences of Christians each year, which were the means of much help, and of drawing believers together in brotherly love.

About twelve years ago Mr. Todd published two volumes of letters of the late John Dickie, of Irvine, Scotland, written to him during his last illness, entitled, "Words of Faith, Hope, and Love, from the Chamber of a Dying Saint" (Partridge), which have had a large circulation, and have been much owned of God, especially for the comfort of His afflicted people.

Mr. Todd was a man of much grace, of sterling uprightness of character, and full of Christ-like sympathy for the afflicted. His last illness was long and painful; but he experienced in full measure the sustaining grace of his heavenly Father. On November 29 he passed peacefully into the presence of his Lord and Saviour, whom he loved, and whom for sixty years he sought to serve. T. O.

Requests for Prayer.

For workers "holding the fort" in solitary places, that they may be Divinely sustained.

For a lately-married couple, at present in deep affliction, that they may be converted to God.

For blessing on a mission at St. Peter's Church, Liverpool, to be conducted by R. M'Lean, from January 14, 1903.

For blessing on a mission being held in the Mission Room, Hazelbury Plucknett, by Mr. Roberts, of the Evangelization Society.

For meetings on board the troopship Plassey (sailing for South Africa on December 15) by Rev. R. Dean Oliver, chaplain to the forces.

For efforts about to be made by Mr. Charles Cook to distribute both bread and copies of the Gospels to starving prisoners in some European gaols.

That the power of God may be manifested in the quickening of believers, and the salvation of sinners, in the town of Axminster and neighbourhood.

That those who are seeking to get skilful, willing and Spirit filled workers, and permanent buildings, with grace, strength, and means to carry on a Christian high school in the East may be blessed in all their undertakings.

On behalf of the annual meeting for potmen and others employed in public-houses, to be held in the Tolmer's Institute, near Euston Square, N.W., on Thursday, 11th inst., arranged by Mr. J. J. Browne, London City Missionary.

That there may be nothing in the Delhi Durbar that may tend to hinder the progress of Christianity, and that those who have gone out from this country to view or take part in the pageant may be roused to interest in missionary work both among natives and Europeans.

The Churches.

Church of England.

The condition of the Archbishop of Canterbury is not considered sufficiently serious to justify the issue of a formal bulletin. It is hoped that complete rest for a few days will result in restoration to health.

A most helpful "Missionary Sunday" was carried out on a recent Lord's Day at St. John's, Upper Holloway (vicar, Rev. H. Dudley Lampen). Large congregations were present. The preacher morning and evening was Rev. J. W. Hall, of North-West India. In the afternoon the Bishop of London made a powerful missionary appeal. In the five Sunday-schools and the two children's services simultaneous addresses by special speakers were given.

Rev. Alfred J. Poynder was inducted to the rectory of Whitechapel on Tuesday week. The Bishop of London, who preached from Heb. xiii. 8, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," said, in the course of his sermon, that Mr. Poynder has undertaken one of the heaviest of tasks, owing to the prevalence not only of sin and indifference, but of a large foreign population. The text, however, is one of the most inspiring in the Bible, and to-day Jesus Christ has more influence in Europe than all statesmen and philosophers.

Congregational.

Rev. Mathias Lansdown, late of Tolmers Square, N.W., commenced his ministry at Trinity Church, Effra Road, Brixton, S.W., on Sunday last.

Rev. Harper Riley, who has been pastor of the church at Gatley since February, 1896, has intimated that he will close his ministry there in February, 1903.

Rev. W. J. Woods, who succeeded the late Dr. Hannay as secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, has just resigned that office, having been for some time past in indifferent health.

Rev. John Thomas has, after five years' pastorate at the Tabernacle Church, Dursley, tendered his resignation, to take effect at the close of this year. Mr. Thomas purposes to devote himself to evangelistic mission work among the Free Churches, as far as his health will permit.

In connection with the Argyle Home Mission, Bath, reopening services of the church at East Twerton have been held, when Rev. J. Turner-Smith preached. The church originally had seating accommodation for 200, but by the enlargement an additional 150 can easily be received. The cost of the improvements will be about £700, of which some local supporters find £100 and Argyle Church the remainder.

Under the auspices of the Young Men's Branch of the Colonial Missionary Society a meeting was held recently in Craven Hill Church, Lancaster Gate, W. This was the first of a series of meetings which the branch hopes to arrange this winter, with the object of interesting the young people of the London churches in Colonial Missions. Rev. A. Giles (pastor), who had laboured in Rhodesia as an agent of the Society, took the chair, and described the work as he had seen it in South Africa.

Rev. George A. Suttle, of Whitefield's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, W.C., has decided to close his ministry there at the end of December. Mr. Suttle has held the pastorate with much acceptance for nine years, and his deacons did all in their power to urge him to continue his work there. He took a month to consider the matter, and he has now given his final decision. The church, unanimously and cordially, has expressed appreciation of the labours of both Mr. and Mrs. Suttle.

Baptist.

The 250th anniversary of the Thomas Cooper Memorial Church, Lincoln, has just been celebrated. The meetings were of a most inspiring and gratifying character, and a thanksgiving fund of £100 was raised.

The first anniversary of Rev. Cecil R. Blunden's settlement at Bildeston has been celebrated at a public meeting. Mr. Blunden gave an epitome of the work, which shows cheering signs of progress. The Sabbath school has increased, Bible classes have been formed, and the C.E. Society re-organized and made a valuable department of church work, while efforts are being put forth to reduce the debt.

The Baptist Mission which started in October, 1900, at Godalming, Surrey, has celebrated its second anniversary. The new pastor, Rev. A. A. Harmer, preached, and gave an address to the young in the afternoon at Borough Hall. The singing was led by a united choir, and accompanied by an orchestra. At a public meeting on a subsequent day, the secretary gave an encouraging report, and stated that the new building would be proceeded with at once.

The annual missionary meeting at Vernon Chapel, W.C., took place on Saturday last. Rev. Mr. Weeks, of the Congo, was the chief speaker, and £103 10s. was handed over to the Rev. L. Tucker for the Baptist Missionary Society. This is the largest amount ever collected during one year by the church. In addition to this the annual thankoffering day in November produced £135, including £45 collected by the pastor, Rev. D. H. Moore.

The annual meeting of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Evangelists' Association was held on the 25th ult. in the Lecture Hall at the Tabernacle. Pastor Thomas Spurgeon presided, and addresses were delivered by Rev. T. E. Howe and Messrs. G. Dudley and G. W. Harris of the Association. The singing of Madame Annie Ryall added largely to the interest of the meeting. From the Secretary's report it was shown that 2,359 services had been conducted during the year, being an addition of 121 over the previous year. The work had embraced eleven counties besides the Metropolis.

Special interest attached this year to the anniversary services of Fillebrook Church, Leytonstone, N.E. On the Lord's Day, Rev. James Mursell, of Edinburgh, preached morning and evening. On the following Wednesday a sermon was preached in the afternoon by Rev. Thomas Spurgeon. The evening meeting, in addition to being the anniversary gathering, was also made the occasion for bidding a public farewell to Rev. John Bradford, who has had the oversight of the church ever since its formation, and has left in consequence of his acceptance of the Secretaryship of the London Baptist Association. Mr. Bradford's devoted labours received cordial recognition.

Methodist.

The sum of £916,980 18s. 2d. has been received in cash by the treasurers of the Twentieth Century Fund of one million guineas of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion.

The vacancy caused by the death of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes in the chairmanship of the Wesleyan Second London district, has been filled by the election of Rev. Dr. Waller, secretary of the Education Committee and one of the ex-presidents, to that position.

The annual report of the Wesleyan Ministerial Colleges shows that at Didsbury College there are sixty-eight students in residence. A special minute speaks in high appreciation of the valuable services rendered for sixteen years by Rev. Dr. Marshall Randles as professor in systematic theology at Didsbury College. An increase of £2,000 a year in the annual income is needed.

The severe gales and shipwrecks of late have drawn out many hearts in deep sympathy for sailors. Prayer was made for seamen on Tuesday week at the muster of the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" at Miss Child's Welcome Home, Canning Town, E. Miss Child gave out the text for the month (Luke ii. 10), in which "all people" includes those who are tossed about on the billows. Capt. Wrake and Messrs. William Luff, J. Owen, H. Holt, and many others, followed.

Presbyterian.

The twenty-seventh anniversary services of St. Andrew's Church, Reading, have been held. Sermons were preached by Rev. W. Kidd, of Leytonstone. The pastor of the congregation, Rev. William Armstrong, M.A., has completed his twenty-fifth year in the ministry of the Church of Christ, and his semi-jubilee has been celebrated with all becoming honour.

Miss Mary Balmer, daughter of Mr. J. S. Balmer, for many years an esteemed elder in the Hampstead congregation, has been appointed Matron of the hospital in connection with the U.F. Church Mission at Lovedale, Cape Colony, South Africa. Miss Balmer, who was formerly a missionary in China and was ordered home owing to ill-health, has been engaged for three years in nursing work at the Addenbrook Hospital, Cambridge.

A United Missionary gathering was held recently in St. George's Church, Stockton, for the churches in Darlington, Middlesbrough, Redcar, and Stockton. Rev. Andrew Ross presided, supported by the ministers of all the churches represented, together with the Presbytery's Foreign Mission Convener, Rev. J. Adamson, West Hartlepool. There was a good attendance, and a convincing and inspiring defence of, and plea for Foreign Missions was made by Rev. Dr. J. C. Gibson, of Swatow, whose well-reasoned remarks were closely followed.

The congregation at Grimsby has had a visit from Rev. John Rutherfurd, M.A., B.D., one of the Synod's Foreign Mission Deputies. His vivid and powerful sermons on the subject of foreign missions brought home to every mind the needs of the nations abroad, and the opportunities given to the home Church of entering into and reaping the harvest of these white fields. This visit more than justifies the Synodical plan of sending forth such men as foreign mission deputies. Mr. Rutherfurd had an interesting conference with the office-bearers and workers, and also addressed the Sunday-school.

Salvation Army.

Five new corps have been opened in Germany.

The commodious premises recently occupied by the Y.M.C.A. in Belfast are to be purchased by the Army for use as their local headquarters.

Nearly 100 of the men who attended the Army's Free Breakfast for the Destitute at Blackfriars on Sunday last, had spent the previous night in the open.

The annual convention held recently in the Assembly Hall, Junction Road, N., conducted by Mr. Thomas Payne, assisted by several well-known speakers, proved a great blessing to those who attended, the presence and blessing of the Lord being realised by all.

During the past two months the evangelist in charge of the "Bishop Hooper" van has been holding missions at several towns and villages in Gloucestershire. The people listened earnestly, and the Lantern lectures were well attended. Protestant books and tracts were well distributed.

Under the leadership of Mr. J. Bassett—backed up by an energetic and hard-working committee—the Town Hall P.S.A. at Burton-on-Trent continues to grow in numbers and varied kinds of usefulness, and has begun its fourteenth year. The service is essentially evangelistic in aim. The twenty-sixth half-yearly prize distribution in connection with the class took place recently in the Y.M.C.A. Hall.

In connection with the Yorkshire Women's Christian Temperance Union, a meeting was recently held at York, attended by delegates from almost every quarter of the county. Miss Sibree, organizing secretary, gave, as is her custom, a most interesting account of her year's work, both in Yorkshire itself, and in other parts of Great Britain, as well as in Ireland, where she was invited for a series of meetings in October last.

An evangelistic service has been commenced on Lord's Day evenings at the Temperance Hall, Bangor, by Mr. Sargeant, assisted by a couple of university students, one of whom is Mr. W. S. Chorley, the eldest son of the superintendent of the N.E. London Gospel Mission, well known to many of our readers. The hope is to reach those who are outside the churches. The Universities' Prayer Union have elected Mr. Chorley as one of its delegates for the Bangor district.

Recently, in the Wesleyan Church, High Street, Deptford, a meeting was held in honour of Mr. Cheeseman, who for fifty years has been connected with the London City Mission, and even longer than that has been active in Gospel work in Deptford. A purse containing £11 was given to Mr. Cheeseman, who at once handed it over to the City Mission. Many kind things were said of the worker, whose reminiscences of past days were listened to with great interest.

The Christian Progress Scripture Reading Union and Living Waters Missionary Union held a combined meeting recently in Exeter Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. Albert A. Head. A most encouraging report was read by the hon. secretary, Miss Agnes M. Boys, who was able to give a good account of considerable progress in the various branches of the work. Short addresses were given by representatives of the two unions. Rev. F. Trevelyan Snow, vicar of St. Peter's, Islington, emphasized the ever-present need and power of prayer in all work for God, and made special reference to the world-wide revival for which Christians all over the world are so expectantly praying. Further information with regard to these two unions will be gladly supplied by Miss Agnes M. Boys, 7, Polworth Road, Streatham, S.W.

About Books.

NEW YEAR MESSAGES.

THE passage from one year to another is very generally a time of heart-searching and self-examination, and it is well that advantage should be taken of it for the issue of messages helpful for such hours. A series of booklets, published by Messrs. Partridge, are likely to prove very useful to Christian workers.

Based on Deut. xxxiii. 25 as a promise, and on Psalm lxxi. 16 as a resolve, Strength for the Day and Shoes for the Way, by Rev. G. Martin Claris, shows how truly the only real equipment for the coming months is at the command of all who will claim it in faith. The wider question of "the Church as she should be" is raised in The Power of the Keys, by Rev. E. W. Moore. After examining what to some is a serious difficulty, Mr. Moore expresses the opinion that it will entirely disappear when the Church returns to her true spiritual level. "A restful and successful year" is Miss Charlotte Murray's wish for all readers of God's Sunbeams; and the possibilities for blessed service in every Christian life are indicated by one in true touch with spiritual things. The experience of King David is made by Miss Sophia M. Nugent to yield deep and far-reaching lessons for the believer in A Threefold Anointing. The results of the fullest receiving of the Holy Ghost are shown to be Christ in full possession, grounding deeper upon the rock of His Word, and opening new conflict. The God-ward and man-ward aspects of the phrase are shown in "Here am I," by Rev. W. H. Griffith-Thomas. When he hears the voice of God the believer gains pardon, power, guidance, courage, peace, and hope; while in his own mouth the words imply surrender, involve service, issue in satisfaction, indicate loyalty, express love, and involve labour. The simple yet faithful words of Heavenly Guidance for the New Year, by A. E. C., will constitute a timely call to new consecration. (1d. each.)

Smaller booklets include Our Pilot on the Shoreless Sea, in which Rev. F. B. Meyer helpfully points out the greatness and many-sidedness of the work of the Holy Spirit in the believer. Again, in The Government upon his Shoulders, Mr. Meyer points out the lines along which many Christians enjoy a blessed experience—not known in its fulness by others—when the will puts the government of all things on the shoulders of Christ. (½d. each.) To her well-known booklets, Henrietta S. Streatfeild has added, Be Ye also Ready, and has driven home, in telling fashion, both the solemn lessons and the great encouragements of the Divine command. (6d. per doz.)

AGAINST UNBELIEF.

THE answer of the Gospel to unbelieving criticism and agnostic contempt is given in a very striking manner by Rev. D. L. Thomson, minister of Overtown, in God's Theatre. (Paisley: Alex. Gardner.) The author has followed modern controversies, and taken an account of the various points on which the Christian faith has been challenged. In a chapter on "Obstacles to Scientific Progress," he reads a timely lesson to some of the cheaper sneers of unfaith; while the story of Evolution theorizing is related in a telling fashion. The pages are very readable, and they will be welcomed by workers who have come at close quarters with the hostile spirit of the age.

Historical Christianity the Religion of Human Life. By Thomas B. Strong, B.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. (1s. 6d. net. Henry Frowde.) This volume contains the substance of six lectures delivered to Oxford University Extension students. The New Testament teaching regarding Christ and his doctrine, as distinguished from critical qualifications and unbelieving theories, is vindicated in a convincing manner; and the argument is so conducted as to appeal to such as are in greatest danger of being misled by modern thought of the destructive order.

As an aid to young believers in giving a reason for the hope that is in them, Rev. Henry Varley, B.A., has grouped the chief "evidences" for our knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as documentary, historical, and experimental—Scientia Christi (2s. 6d. E. Stock). The volume is a thoroughly popular and thoughtful treatment of the subject, and we commend it specially to the notice of those who are concerned with the guidance of inquiring young people. Christian men are sometimes amazed when they discover that there is so much circumstantial evidence in support of their faith; and, while nothing can add to the certainty which is grounded on a personal experience of the indwelling Spirit, our young friends should not be left to fear, if they do not believe, that philosophy and a priori argument are on the side of the unbeliever.

SUFFOLK MARTYRS.

WE sing of "the noble army of martyrs;" it is time we were able more intelligently to praise God for their testimony. A nation that forgets those whose blood was shed for its religious liberty will assuredly be off guard in the presence of the enemy, and become the victims of tyranny and oppression, calling for new heroism and further witnessing unto death.

We welcome every indication of renewed interest in the life and labours of those who "counted not their lives dear unto them" in the service of Christ in our land in the sixteenth century. A capital piece of work in this line is before us:—Seventeen Suffolk Martyrs, by Nina Frances Layard. (2s. 6d. Ipswich: Smith, Suitall Press.) Several of the papers deal with Ipswich worthies, including Thomas Bilney and Agnes Wardall; then come records from Dovercourt and Bergholt, and, of course, the famous testimony of Rowland Taylor of Hadleigh. There are twelve illustrations, all well executed.

In a sympathetic preface, Rev. Canon Garratt remarks, with serious timeliness: "It will be an evil day for England if she is unmindful of the past, and ever again allows the Roman Church—which, when she has the power, cannot but persecute, according to her principles—to obtain ascendancy once more."

Rev. F. S. Webster's new book, Elijah: the Man of Prayer, is now ready. It will be gladly welcomed by such as know the author's suggestive monograph, "Elisha: the Prophet of Vision." (1s. Morgan & Scott.)

Spiritualism according to the Scriptures. By Rev. H. P. Welton, D.D. (6d. Henderson, 8, Lombard Street, Toronto.) Solemn words regarding an abomination on which the Scriptures of old have more to say than some moderns seem disposed to think.

Letters on Health and Happiness, showing how to remove suffering, restore health and strength, prevent irremediable organic disease, and prolong the blessing of a cheerful mind in a healthy body to a genial longevity. By John A. Bevan, M.D. (2s. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.). A Christian physician gives much sound advice in this little work.

Messrs. Weekes & Co. have issued in handy form the Hymn Tunes composed by the late Dr. Edward J. Hopkins, Organist to the two Learned and Honorable Societies of the Temple, &c., collated and edited by William H. Stocks, organist of Dulwich College. (2s. 6d.) The portrait is an embellishment of the book, and an interesting memorial of the distinguished composer.

Preaching the Word: A Few Thoughts on an Important Subject. By a Lay Reader of the Dioceses of Chester and Liverpool. (6d. J. A. Thompson & Co., Church House, Liverpool.) An interesting and instructive little work by Mr. W. C. Procter. The pages set the ordinance of preaching in a striking light, and one could wish that many workers for Christ would read them.

The smaller works of Dr. J. R. Miller are among the most useful that have come from his fruitful pen. Six of these are given in Shining and Serving (3s. 6d. Melrose), among them being "The Transfigured Life," "The Dew of Thy Youth," and "Why should we Worry?" This is a handsome book, got up in a style that indicates it as specially suitable for presentation purposes. We welcome very heartily The Upper Currents, which is altogether beautiful as a statement of truth and marvellously winning in its spiritual appeal. This is also a presentation volume. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Collegian, the organ of the Baptist Students' Fraternal Union, is a bright little paper. Its contents appeal specially to men studying for the ministry in the various colleges of the denomination; there are articles on subjects that enter into the making of the good minister, also items of news regarding college life. A recent discussion placed in its true light of unworthiness the tendency to wear bogus honours, in the form of degrees procured from America without substantial examination, or guarantees of learning such as would be required in this country. (Six issues in the year, 2d. each. Baptist Tract and Book Society, 16, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.)

Workers, parents, and guardians who are seeking to instil Protestant sentiments into the minds of the rising generation will find real help in two new volumes: Light Ahoy: or the Secrets of the Lighthouse, by Augusta Cook; and The Story of William the Silent and Holland's Fight for Freedom, by W. Stanley Martin. (1s. and 1s. 6d. each. Morgan & Scott.) Bold clear type, attractive binding, and good illustrations combine to commend these books to youthful readers. It is of the first importance that such instruction as is here given should be carefully and patiently provided in every Protestant family, that the coming men and women may be well armed for the conflict with error and supersition.

Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co. have brought out a series of small but attractive story-books. We find The Conjurer's Wand, by Henrietta S. Streatfeild; Little Tim and His Picture, by Beatrice May; Midge, by L. E. Tiddeman (6d. each); Only Roy, by E. M. Waterworth and Jennie Chappell; and Faithful Friends, by C. A. Mercer (9d. each). The coloured picture books of the same firm, which are up to the old excellent standard, include Bruno's Prize, Three and Grandpa (1s. each), March Away, and After the Ball (6d. each).

The story of Joseph has attractions for young and old. It is not only an episode in the history of redemption, but a narrative replete with human interest. Mr. Robert Bird, whose works on the New Testament have had such an extensive circulation, has treated the story in a thoroughly sympathetic manner in Joseph the Dreamer. (6s. Nelsons.) He has paraphrased the Bible narrative in the way required for child readers, and filled in the background of the picture with materials belonging to the times in which Joseph lived. It is a charming book, and the 300 illustrations do much to impress the story on the mind.

Among Christmas cards and booklets, some of the most artistic we have seen are in the list of Messrs. Hills & Co., Limited. Many of them will appeal to High Church purchasers especially, but among others that are more general may be instanced: "Christmas Carol," by Longfellow, and another translated from the French with quaint illustrations. The calendars include, "Not for an Age, but for all Time," with four beautiful Shakespearean pictures (1s. 6d.), one with quotations from Robert Louis Stevenson, and a third based on the Church Calendar (1s. each). The sixpenny booklets have each a reproduction from one of the world's masterpieces, with verses from many sources, and their general get-up is very pleasing.

Books on preaching appeal to a very wide constituency indeed. The first and paramount necessity is to have a message; but after that much may be learned that will make the proclamation more effective. Many must preach who can never have the benefit of personal training; but that makes it the more important to gain all that can be learned from books. A very useful volume of this class is Preaching and Preachers, by Joseph Gowan. (6s. E. Stock.) Hints are given on the value and method of the preparation, illustration, and construction of sermons or addresses. The guidance on the subject of reading is marked by sound common sense. We welcome the frank and full treatment of the subject of plagiarism. While free of the scholastic or class-room air, this book is well fitted to make many a witness for the Lord more efficient in his service.

The Opened Ear, by E. J. Beaumont, evangelist, is a booklet that should have many readers. (2d. The Author, 26, Trafalgar Road, Peckham, S.E.)

A Whittier Treasury: Selections from the works of the poet. Edited by the Countess of Portsmouth. A literary gem in every sense. (3d. Thomas Burleigh.)

Praying "In" not "To" the Holy Spirit. This booklet by Major-General A. H. Hutchinson has been re-issued, and we feel assured that many will read it to great profit. (2d. per doz. Morgan & Scott.)

The threefold card, "Because . . . Therefore," will fittingly bring to mind a number of promises grouped round the fact that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and for ever. (1d. Miss Body, Acomb, York.)

Rev. Walter Bradbury's helpful booklet, entitled Hints to the Clergy, contains some sound advice, addressed privately to those who engage in evangelistic work. (1d. Of the Author, 6, South Hill Park, Hampstead, N.W.)

A second edition of Mr. Albert Dawson's popular Life of Dr. Parker being called for, the author has written an additional chapter dealing with the closing scenes and events in the great preacher's career, and the enlarged work will be issued shortly by Partridge & Co.

The first two publications of the British Soldiers' and Sailors' Gospel Letter Mission are by the Bishop of Durham and Rev. Dr. Elder Cumming respectively, and contain such good words of spiritual wisdom and counsel as might be expected of such leaders. (6d. doz. Drummond's Tract Depot, Stirling.

Renewal of the Covenant. Rev. F. J. Laverack has compiled an order of service of this nature. It aims to fix the attention of church members on the possibilities and responsibilities of their position by a fuller consecration in the service of our Lord. (3s. per 100, post paid. Publication Department, Memorial Hall.)

Among recent publications of the Imperial Protestant Alliance are: The King's Declaration. By the Right Hon. Lord Overtoun. (1d.); and The Jesuit Invasion. By R. J. N. (3d. per dozen.) These should be widely disseminated at the present time. (I.P.F. Office, 3, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate S.W.)

Mr. Mackenzie Bell's lyric, "Lord, teach us to Pray," which is set to music as an Anthem by Herr Georg Liebling, has been translated into German verse by Rev. Professor Carl Glebe, of Bockum, Westphalia, for use throughout Germany. The second edition of the Anthem, first published in London by Dr. Charles Vincent, has both the English and the German words.

The Christian Progress Almanack, compiled by Agnes M. Boys, gives texts for every day. There are some choice selections of spiritual thought on alternate pages. (2d. Bemrose & Son.) Another useful booklet is The Christian Bible-searching Calendar. New Series. The Texts are found in the Daily Second Lessons and Psalms on special subjects. The Old Series gives Texts from each Sunday's First Lesson, Epistle, and Gospel. (½d. each, post free. Miss Mouck-Mason, Cheriton Road, Folkestone.) Among wall sheets we name as old favourites, John Ploughman's Almanack, a bright wall-sheet, and Spurgeon's Illustrated Almanack, a booklet that will be welcome in many a home (1d. each. Passmore & Alabaster.)

London's Bitter Cry. We hope our readers will read the two brief articles, "A Midnight Ramble" (p. 21), and "You'd nearly Forgot!" (p. 13), which appear in the present issue. They reveal in a striking manner the sorry condition of life prevalent in our midst.

Peace Sunday. Next Sunday is to be observed in some hundreds of churches as "Peace Sunday." A large number of ministers have promised either to preach sermons or to make references to the subject of international peace. This country has reason to thank God for the event of June last, which lifted a thick cloud from us. The peace for which all true men long must be radical if it is to endure, and it cannot be that, unless the Christmas Gospel message is received into the hearts of men.

Dr. Torrey. On p. 13 we give some account of the progress of Dr. Torrey's work in India. Letters from various cities tell of great blessing following the meetings. Here we have encouragement to pray that God will abundantly own the work of His servant on his visit to Great Britain in the New Year.

True Patriotism. An appeal has been made by the editor of the new Imperialist review, King and Country, to every clergyman in the country, suggesting that the growing pride in the Empire should be utilized to encourage a higher ideal of manly life. A London clergyman asks in reply whether the imperialism to be fostered is that of Jesus Christ or of Rudyard Kipling—that which rests on a lofty, moral ideal, or that which depends on mere human force. The Empire pride that should be fostered in the minds of our growing lads is that which is linked with a love of righteousness, liberty, true enlightenment, and purity of life. All other is of less than no account. There is no nobler sentiment than patriotism of the true kind, nor a meaner than that which claims that one's own country must necessarily be right in every dispute, and justified in every act of aggression.

Divine Imperialism. To the thoughtful student of history, few things are more impressive than the failure, one after another, of all the great efforts to attain to world-wide imperial rule. Based as they were chiefly upon numbers and extent, all those great empires were predestined to fall, and their object-lesson is one that we might well take to heart in these islands today. It has been well said that the imperialism of the Name on the vesture (Rev. xix. 16) is the only one based upon indisputable Divine right. For the extension of that Divine Imperialism we pray day by day, "Thy Kingdom come;" but as Ruskin once said:—

When you pray "Thy Kingdom come," you either want it to come or you don't. If you don't, you should not pray for it. If you do, you must do more than pray for it—you must live for it, and labour for the Kingdom of God.

The Archbishop and the Bill. The message of our aged Primate, after his failure to deliver his speech on the Education Bill in the House of Lords, urging through the Bishop of Winchester that "Churchmen, clerical and lay, would refrain from inflicting any hardship on Nonconformists in the administration of the Bill," was a gracious act, which gained added weight in that it was sent from his sick bed, and we trust that when the Bill becomes law this advice will be scrupulously followed. At the same time, the very fact that any appeal of the kind should be made is a significant confession that the Bill makes such hardship possible, and is the very ground on which fair-minded men protest against it.

The Real Question at Issue. As is pointed out in a pamphlet by Rev. W. J. Dawson on "Protestantism and the Reformation," the real issue in the Education controversy is the supremacy of the principles that made the Reformation possible. The essence of that movement was the supremacy of the Bible over the Church; the essence of the present reaction is the supremacy of the Church over the Bible as the final court of appeal. Sacramentarians dare not trust the Bible to convey its own message without priestly comment. Here we have the crux of the situation, which is glozed over in controversy by many irrelevancies. The next generation will have to fight this battle of Bible v. Church over again. If the great Reformation leaders were alive today, we cannot doubt which side they would take.

Temperance and the Pensions Scheme. A large number of suggestions have been made as to the way in which the Government might provide the great fund which would be required if the old-age pensions scheme were adopted. Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., in a recent address, has, however, stated that with a reduction in our wasteful expenditure of £190,000,000 a year upon intoxicating liquors, it would not be necessary to make any call upon the people, or to increase the burden of taxation in order to provide for aged and disabled workers. He said:—

We are talking about pensions of 5s. a week, Actuaries tell us that a payment of 33s. a year by men and women from twenty years upwards would secure a pension of 10s. a week at the age of sixty-five. At that rate the money spent on the average by the working classes of this country would procure for them a pension of £2 per week for a man and his wife.

In this light it is not difficult to understand the antagonism of the great Friendly Societies to the proposed Parliamentary scheme.

A Drink-Swept Country. While the shame of the recent municipal elections in several Scottish towns is still fresh, a letter has been addressed by Lord Balfour from Whitehall to the Glasgow magistrates concerning the startling increase of crime in Scotland. The letter is a practical commentary on the elections, although Lord Balfour makes no reference to them. The elections in several places were a notable triumph for the drink party. Whisky sellers swept the boards at Aberdeen, and in many other places a triumph on a smaller scale was won. Worst of all was the defeat of Lord Provost Chisholm at Glasgow. A city is in a bad way when it decides to dispense with the public services of a Christian gentleman of his type. And now Lord Balfour tells Scotland of its shame. This country, famed for its Bible reading and its kirks, bids fair to head the list of drink-sodden countries. The number of convicted prisoners last year was greater, per 100,000 of the population, than in England and Ireland put together. Such figures as these should awaken the people to shame and repentance. The saddest thing of all, however, is the way in which the Church is compromised with the drink traffic. Not a few connected with the Church are drink-sellers, and their ministers are consequently tongue-tied. Surely the temple needs cleansing first of all.

The Passing of the Barmaid. According to a special correspondent of the Daily News, the temperance societies of Birmingham are taking steps which it is hoped will issue in the removal of the barmaid from licensed houses. There seems to be a great deal of encouragement from the city officials given to this new movement. In the interests of the girls themselves we hope success will crown the effort, for a drinking shop is one of the last places in which a respectable girl or woman should be placed. It is not possible for a girl to be daily exposed to the spectacle of drinking men whom she serves, and to hear the language all too prevalent in public houses, without her morals being seriously menaced. In the interests of womanhood the barmaids' profession should cease to exist. The "trade" representative pictures an alarming state of things if these girls should be suddenly thrown out of employment. Those, however, who are working on their behalf will not leave that side of the question untouched.

The Massacre of the Innocents. In a striking article in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, Mr. H. G. Wells deals thoughtfully with the subject of "Mankind in the Making," and the question of the deterioration and development of the population. It would be difficult to accept all the writer's deductions and suggestions, but the paper is well calculated to induce very serious thought as to the future of myriads of our people if the social and economic causes of the terrible decadence are not drastically dealt with. What, for instance, could be more urgent than the surroundings of child life in our large centres of industry? Mr. Wells points out that while in Rutland the death rate of children under five years old is only 105 per 1,000, and in Dorset 135, in Lancashire it is 274; and he adds:

A vast multitude of children of untainted blood, and good mental and moral probabilities—as many, perhaps, as 100 in each 1,000 born—die yearly through insufficient food, insufficient good air, and insufficient attention. At least 161 children out of every 1,000 are killed by the conditions into which they are born.

The God of To-Morrow. The melancholy cases reported in the papers in which men have taken their lives because of the blackness of their future, suggest some serious reflections. There is always in the world a large class of persons to whose vision life is a dark jungle through which no light breaks, and some of these, in a moment of frenzy, have thought to end their misery by quitting the world. The real trouble with all such is not that which they imagine to be the trouble, i.e., the nearer circumstances so full of tanglement; but it is that they are out of relation with Him who has all destinies in His hands. Material things appeal to most men with greater force than spiritual things, and men trust in what they can see. When reverse comes and the object of their trust vanishes, there is nothing left to them. It is only real heart trust in God, through Christ, that can save a man from mental catastrophe in time of reverse. He must believe in the God of to-morrow—the One who waits for His true children in the morning, and conducts them to their proper goal. Only thus can heart and mind be freed from carking worry, and worse.

An Agnostic Confession. A confession recently published concerning "the religious days" of a prominent Freethinker explains what has long been an inexplicable puzzle to many. His unbelief has never been of that coarse, low type which was once so common, and which even now survives among professional Atheists. As a boy he was devout, and took part in prayer meetings, but it is clear from his own account, that he never really grasped what prayer was au fond, and he had the further misfortune to be badly directed in his inquiries by an ill-qualified man, whose answer, he says, "did not make me disbelieve, but the foundation had slipped away from under my feet." It is a pathetic confession and is evidently sincere. Yet we do not hesitate to say that he ought not to have rested there, but at once have sought further help. An incident of this kind should make all who have to deal with young inquiring minds very careful. It is easy to snub, or carelessly deal with youthful difficulties, but failure to guide thoroughly and wisely at the critical moment may, as in this case, switch off a life upon the track of doubt, perhaps for ever.

Drawing, not Driving. A Scottish contemporary very properly complains of the indiscrimate abuse which is too often heaped upon the churches by outside workers. It is unhappily only too true that the religious life of many church members is far removed from what it ought to be. This will not be rectified, however, by the policy of abuse. Part of John Wesley's advice to his preachers was, "Let your rule be always by way of promise, never driving where drawing is possible." There is no quicker way of shaming a man than to hold before him the true life, and by all means compel him to face his own failure to reach it. He is more likely to be reached in that way than in any other.

The Decline of Darwinism. Thanks to the outspoken statements of a number of scientists whose knowledge is based upon evidence and discovery, instead of supposition and presumption, the Evolution theory of late years seems less stable in its foundations. Its professors always laid great stress upon the assertion that variation and evolution in animals or plants is an almost incredibly slow process. Now Mr. Edward Fry, in an excellent paper in the current number of the Monthly Review on the "Age of the Inhabited World," urges that there is a huge volume of evidence to prove that the statement is fallacious; that instead of periods of millions of years being required to carry a race of organisms from one family to another, the pace of organic change may be very sudden, and that it may occur "without human aid or guidance." This phenomenon has already been observed in no fewer than 110 different kinds of plants. Despite all these testimonies, however, there are preachers who still continue to perplex their hearers with the subtleties of Darwinism.

A Significant Movement. It is gratifying to read that "a very considerable movement has arisen in France for a general Arbitration Treaty between France and this country." The lead, we are told, has been taken by the Chamber of Commerce in Paris, a step that has been followed by nearly the whole of the provincial Chambers. This receives added significance when we remember that French Chambers of Commerce are not voluntary societies, as with us, but regularly constituted, popularly elected commercial parliaments from merchants of the higher class, constituting bodies of powerful influence, who among other duties have a large control over commercial education. It is fashionable to say nowadays that the wars of the future will be fiscal and commercial wars, owing to the friction arising out of conflicting international interests. But at bottom the commercial interests of all nations depend on the maintenance of peace, and it is a good sign to find that this is beginning to be felt on the other side of the channel as well as in this country.

Christianity in Japan. There is much writing of a deprecatory and pessimistic kind in regard to the position of Christianity in the land of our new allies, and it is urged that as a set-off to the teachings of Jesus we have given the Japanese an introduction to the soul-destroying sceptical philosophy of the day, and that the latter is undermining the former. Like many other arguments against Christianity, this is forced too far. The mission workers in Japan, as elsewhere, are not blatant, and their influence is quietly spreading in its appointed work. To-day there are 723 Protestant missionaries labouring in the islands, with a membership of over 45,000, and about 20,000 inquirers. There are seventy-one self-supporting, and 316 partly self-supporting, congregations; 864 Sunday schools, with 33,039 scholars, and fifty-nine day-schools, with over 8,000 pupils. These figures testify to the visible results, but the indirect ones are incalculable. As a missionary, Rev. J. O. Spencer, has said, the influence upon the national life is enormous. Each session of Parliament, for instance, since 1890 has had at least fifteen Christian members, and they have been the moulders of Parliamentary thought. Five of the seven Presidents of the House have been selected from the Christians. And as Mr. Spencer has remarked:—

> It is not too much to say that it was the influence of Christianity which placed the immortal article in the constitution of Japan, guaranteeing religious liberty to every Japanese subject.

Ministerial Breakdowns. Referring to the question as to who is to blame for ministerial breakdowns, an esteemed correspondent points out the lines along which, under the good hand of God, the difficulty has been provided for during his own long period of Christian service. The minister being the first and greatest sufferer, it is to him that the remedy must be applied; and God's provision for making such breakdowns impossible is found in His Word. The renewal of strength is promised in Isa. xl. 31; and Caleb's testimony at eighty-five was that he felt his powers as vigorous as they had been at forty. The root of the matter lies in the question, Upon whom does the minister really and continually wait? If, like Isaiah and Jeremiah, he goes only where God sends him, speaking only when, and where, and what God commands him, he may expect the continued supply of the everlasting strength of God. Under these conditions he will do God's work, and breakdowns will become impossible.

Useless Reading. John Locke has in his works a severe passage on the subject of "useless reading," which has a much wider and deeper application than it could possibly have had in his day. The amount of reading nowadays which is aimless, undiscriminating, and worse than useless, is appalling. The object of reading is to fill the mind with ideas, and to quicken it to think for itself. In order to fulfil these two purposes, what we read should be valuable in itself, and should be so absorbed as to have time to sink effectually into the mind. But, for the most part, people read far too much; they exercise little or no choice, and they seldom pause to think either at the time or afterwards. The result is that with a large proportion of readers, they forget what they have read almost as soon as they have put the book down, and what they do retain is often not worth retaining. The ethics of reading is, therefore, a subject that should have more attention in our educational system, and in the general training of the mind. To love good books, to give the mind to their mastery, and to make a practical use of them, are among the most important conditions of mental health and happiness. But all other books together ought not to occupy as much of our thought as the Word of God.

Negligences and Ignorances. It is natural, and perhaps essential, that in repentance prominence should be given to sins of commission which have for a time darkened and saddened the spiritual life. It is frequently overlooked, however, that these sins would not have been committed had they not been preceded by sins of omission in periods marked by what Rev. Dr. Donald Mackay has designated, "the disobedience of inaction"—times in which prayer and the reading and study of God's Word have been neglected, and there has, consequently, been a want of preparation for the numerous temptations of the daily life. Sins of omission are put in the first rank by our Lord (Matt. xxv. 41-46); and so the Apostle, doubtless bearing in mind that indictment, emphasizes the danger of the negative attitude: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" (Heb. ii. 3.) The framers of the Litany recognised this, and therefore included the petition for true repentance and pardon for not only "all our sins," but for the "negligences and ignorances," the omissions, which had been at the root of the open transgressions, and the ignorances which might have been removed by the study of the Divine commands and warnings.

*Family Prayer.

By Rev. MARSHALL P. TALLING, Ph.D.

CHILDREN gain conceptions of God and religion, of life and duty, from the parental regard for the Scriptures, observance of the Sabbath, attitude towards the Church, and from the general bearing and manner of imposing discipline. All these things tell powerfully on a child's notion of invisible and eternal verities. One of the most potent spells ever cast upon the impressible nature of a child is that which comes through a mother's prayers, and early teaching of prayer. This is altogether unique. Another great religious influence resides in the custom of asking grace at table. Where this is reverently and wisely done it exerts a power, none the less because not easily traced. Whatsoever fosters true conceptions of God and our relations to Him has real spiritual worth. How carefully, then, even the simplest religious act should be done! But nothing can take the place of that institution which is distinctively called Family Prayer—an institution which holds its place from infancy to age, through all the varied stages of life, without losing its peculiar helpfulness.

To all who take part in it, peculiar benefits accrue.

IT SUPPLIES THE TRUE PERSPECTIVE.

To Parents.—On account of the difficulties that face members of the family, and dangers that threaten, especially the children; because of the foes unseen and events unknown, which menace the home, the business, and life itself, it is a good thing for the household in the morning to take an outlook over the day. To the parent this is peculiarly helpful, since he does it in the light of interests, not simply his own, but theirs also. Then this is done under the best circumstances, and in the best frame of mind to see things in their perspective, and to realize their worth. God is invited into each day's operations, and all are committed to Him for safety—an impressive thing for both parent and child. The evening prayer is a solemn review of the day and its doings, in the best mood to appreciate its mercies, to correct its wrongs, to ask forgiveness for its sin, and to seek grace and counsel for the day to come. Again, the parent who prays with his household reinforces the strength of his position as head of the house. All who have had very pious parents attest the sanctity which crept into their conception of father or mother while listening to their communion with God. Christian biography is full of examples.

Further, prayer with the family makes the exercise of discipline easier. It imparts a good influence all round. It removes the ragged edge of anger, gives punishment a new sanction, and correction more tenderness.

Better still, by conducting devotions with his whole household the parent places himself under wholesome restraint, and fortifies himself against slips and misdemeanours which would rob him of his influence. When he openly places himself in Divine relations, his sense of consistency moves within, and the eternal fitness of things hedges him without. He has put himself where he has got to be what he ought to be—a daring and noble thing to do. Furthermore, he has not sacrificed himself by a small weakness at the point where a little strength can effect more, and bring richer returns than anywhere else in the world. The family altar is a parents' throne, regal with the royalty of the Higher Presence associated with him there.

MUTUAL SYMPATHY AND INTERESTS.

To Children.—By giving "Our Father which is in heaven" the crowning position in the home, the children gain true conceptions of Him and their universal obligations to Him. So also their views of life, of men and things, are corrected and adjusted. Through your prayer they learn your relation to impending events, joyous or sad, and take on your feelings. Your gratitude enters their thought, your anxiety lodges in their mind, your solicitude for them kindles their sympathy. Your tenderness towards the sick and bereaved, the tempted and tried, the lost and sinful, and your importunity for salvation, tell upon them. Unconsciously they will adopt your sentiments. Moreover, at the family altar you have the opportunity of communion with God about matters in such a way that they learn in a sacred atmosphere what you could not so well tell them directly. There is an immense leverage here.

Then the fact that your son, or daughter, or employés, learn through prayer that you feel deeply about a matter, opens the way for direct discussion of it later. They have learned three things about it: (1) that it is important; (2) the direction of your thoughts about it; and (3) that you are anxious to be right and to act wisely in the circumstances. In other words, prayer together opens the way for rational, sympathetic, and prayerful counsel together about the same thing.

Again, domestic devotions exert a kindly influence upon the heart-life of the household. Your love is cultivated by the expression it gets at the altar, and your child's love grows in that sunshine. In short, their practical and emotional life is defended and developed, and that in such a way as to link together all the household in fuller sympathy and holier affection.

A WIDENING CIRCLE OF INFLUENCE.

Friends and Domestics.—But in many homes there are relatives, visitors, employés, &c., and these all share in the benefits of worship. Their presence gives devotion a special cast, and it is in this special way that peculiar benefits result. Old age is a benediction when held in deference. Such regard breeds more good in a young life than the kindness of youth can confer upon age. And the lambs of the fold must not be forgotten, nor the stranger that is within thy gates. The whole household should worship together, since they must live and labour in domestic relations, and these should be relations of peace, harmony, and mutual regard—all of which are sanctified by prayer.

Furthermore, it is to be observed that all these benefits attach to domestic worship apart from the supremest blessing, namely, actual personal communion with God, and the answers divinely sent in response to the soul-hunger. But, further still, besides prayer, family devotions include also the reading of Scripture, and one of the richest increments of profit is the increased knowledge of God's Word. As a fortification of life, as an inspiration in human struggle, as a guide in earth's pilgrimage, the knowledge of the Word of Life is inestimable. And what a host of the white-robed throng owe their redemption, humanly speaking, to influence brought to bear upon them at the family altar! As a place to meet God, there is no place like home.

Bethshan, Drayton Park, N.

SINCE the Bethshan Missionary Training Home was closed last April, the funds which God has graciously supplied through His children have been devoted chiefly to necessary repairs to the premises. After much prayer and waiting on God for guidance as to the next step, it has been found that there are a good number of the Lord's people—missionaries and other workers—who would value a place apart in London, where they can have fellowship and special facilities for studying the Word of God, and becoming better equipped for service in these "perilous times." Therefore it is proposed (D.V.) to open the house early in the New Year for paying guests, and to arrange courses of Bible Instruction to be given by various teachers. Applications to be made to Rev. "Fully Consecrated to Him."

By MR. HENRY VARLEY.

DURING a conversation with Mr. D. L. Moody at Willow Park, Dublin, in 1872, subsequent to a night of prayer, the Lord gave me the use of an expression that has become widely known and memorable. It had passed from my mind until some months afterwards, during which Mr. Moody, graciously filled with Divine energy, recrossed the Atlantic for Chicago, prior to his return with Mr. Sankey at the commencement of their great work in 1873.

Their first brief mission was held in the city of York. Thence they proceeded to Sunderland, and next to the busy northern city, Newcastle. Crowds assembled at the meetings, and many were brought into vital union with Christ. In order the more heartily to enlist the co-operation of the ministers of the city and district, an all-day conference was held in Newcastle. Mr. Moody telegraphed inviting me to share the day with them, and I responded.

During the afternoon of the day of conference Mr. Moody asked me to join him in the vestry of the Baptist Church. We were alone, and he recalled the night's meeting at Willow Park and our converse the following morning. "Do you remember your words?" he said. I replied, "I well remember our interview, but I do not recall any special utterance." "Don't you remember saying, 'Moody, the world has yet to see what God will do with a man fully consecrated to Him'?" "Not the actual sentence," I replied. "Ah," said Mr. Moody, "those were the words sent to my soul, through you, from the Living God. As I crossed the wide Atlantic the boards of the deck of the vessel were engraved with them, and when I reached Chicago the very paving stones seemed marked with, 'Moody, the world has yet to see what God will do with a man fully consecrated to Him.' Under the power of those words I have come back to England, and I felt that I must not let more time pass until I let you know how God had used your words to my inmost soul."

I need not say how we rejoiced together, nor how my whole being was filled with gratitude as there came to mind the suggestive text, "A word spoken in due season, how good is it!" Little did I think that a single sentence was to be so signally used, and made to bring forth abundant fruit. The facts are recorded, not for the writer's praise, but as an illustration and proof of what one night's waiting upon God for humbling and accession of power may produce, viz., great and enduring results in personal character and world-wide service.

Not in vain is it written by the living God: "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at My gates, waiting at the posts of My doors, for whoso findeth Me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord."

The Portman Club.

THE Portman Club, which is under the auspices of the Young Women's Christian Association, commends itself to the notice of ladies, not alone on account of its central position, the comfort which it affords, and its good management, but because it forms a rallying point for Christian workers.

The committee reserve to themselves the right of electing special temporary members, for the benefit of those coming from abroad for a short time, at a subscription of 7s. 6d. for every three months. The ordinary subscription is one guinea, with an entrance fee of one guinea—a modest fee compared with that of other clubs.

It is hoped that the coming year may see an increase in its membership. Bedroom accommodation is provided, a great convenience for those living at a distance. Communications should be addressed to Miss Soltau, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

Woman's Mission to Women.—In connection with the Female Mission to the Fallen (32, Charing Cross, S.W.), an average of over a thousand new cases a year have been dealt with during the past five years. Altogether 36,699 have been assisted by the Mission since its commencement.

The Testing of Malcolm Stewart.

IN the twilight of a September evening the figures of two men were silhouetted against the soft loveliness of a Mediterranean sky, as they stood on the deck of one of the English men-of-war lying off Malta. They were two of the ward-room officers, and were not only messmates but friends united by a tie of peculiar strength.

Malcolm Stewart had joined the ship a few months before, followed by a godly mother's prayers, but grieving her heart by a careless disregard of all that she held most sacred.

"Don't worry, mother," was his laughing response to her earnest words of farewell; "I shall begin to think some of these days, and then you will see what a saint I shall become. Of course," with a spasm of emotion passing over his bright young face, "I know how you pray, dear old mother, and such prayers as yours won't be in vain; but you know what a careless dog I am!"

Thank God, there are men, brave young ones too, who help in the answers to such prayers wrung from the very depths of true Christian mothers' hearts. Eric Stanley was one of these. He was first lieutenant on H.M.S. Arethusa, and had, in addition to a handsome personality, a rare charm of manner and the yet rarer quality of enthusiastic loyalty to the Captain of his salvation. He had been strongly attracted to Malcolm, and many an earnest talk they had had when on watch together.

Much as Malcolm loved and respected his mother, he was able to hold out against her appeals which, with the audacious complacency of youth, he thought narrow and old-fashioned. But he could not thus treat Eric Stanley's burning words. To come in contact with a young fellow not much older than himself, brimming over with physical enjoyment, a splendid athlete, and the instigator of cricket and other manly games to keep the men out of danger ashore; to watch the quiet dignity of his bearing in association with messmates of very different tastes and habits, and then, in moments of unrestrained confidences, to hear him speak out of a full heart of his joy and satisfaction in the service and friendship of the Lord Jesus, was

AN EXPERIENCE VERY NEW AND STARTLING.

Thus, in course of time his mother's prayers were answered, and his friend's heart rejoiced when he said one evening, "Stanley, I want to join you in the service of your King!" Eager questioning and instruction followed, and very soon the young inquirer beheld the Lamb of God as his Great Sacrifice and Saviour, and for days his face shone with that strange radiance that no earthly power, not even the purest human love, can bring.

But on the evening of which I speak, as Eric came to his side, he saw the brightness shadowed, and in its place an expression of keen mental pain. "What is it, Malcolm?" he involuntarily asked, adding quickly, "But do not tell me unless you wish."

"I should like to tell you, old fellow," Malcolm said, "though it will only be for the comfort of your sympathy and prayer, for it is a battle I must fight out for myself, and only God knows what it means to me. I have told you of my engagement to Marian Leslie," he went on, "but unless you saw her you could not possibly know what reason I have to be proud of it, for she is truly a queen among girls; and I have only to-night realized that I must lose her." "How is that?" asked Eric.

"Well, you see, I have been so absorbed in my new feelings that even Marian somehow had to take a second place, but to-night I was planning to write to her and to mother to tell them all about it. Dear mother, how glad she will be! But with Marian it is different; she has never had any early Christian teaching, and is, I fancy, quite opposed to spiritual truth—thinks it all cant, don't you know; and she shines so in society, and is so much admired, that she naturally goes in for that sort of thing with all her heart, and it came over me like a thunder-clap to-night that if I tell her of the change in my views she will give me up. What would you advise me to do?" and the troubled look on the young face was very pitiful.

Eric was silent for a moment, his heart full of sympathy and prayer; then he laid his hand on his friend's shoulder. "You must tell her," he said, with quiet emphasis; "honesty demands it, and then you must claim the grace and strength of your new Master, and trust Him for the issue. It is a heavy cross, He only knows how heavy, let us ask Him for power to bear it." And as they stood there in the solemn quiet of the night Stanley's voice, in low, hushed tones, breathed passionate words of prayer for his friend, asking that, if possible, this his first confession of Christ might bring not disunion, but light and blessing to the girl he loved.

When he turned to Malcolm he saw that his countenance was no more sad, but again calm with Heaven's own peace. "I will write to her to-night," he said quietly," "and—I can leave it now!"

The days that must pass before he could receive his answer were, at the best, very trying ones, and Stanley's tact and brotherliness were taxed to their utmost in the attempt to cheer and hearten him. At length the morning came for the arrival of the English mails, and it touched Stanley to see the set, white face of his friend, as he bravely kept down all other signs of agitation. It was the first lieutenant's duty to take the bags to the captain's cabin, and to await their unsealing and the distribution of their contents. As they were emptied on to the cabin table he saw a book-parcel directed to Lieutenant Stewart, and, asking permission, he dispatched it at once to him by a petty officer in waiting. He was engaged for some time, and when he reached the deck he found Stewart with a face literally transfigured with joy.

"Look what she has sent me!" he said, breathlessly, as he held out to him a copy of the Life of Captain Hedley Vicars. "It's too wonderful! she hasn't got my letter yet, she has been from home visiting some friends, who took her to hear a great preacher—Canon A——, and she finds her life has been altogether wrong, and wants to change it, and doesn't exactly know how, so she wants me to help her! And she has sent this book to help me—did you ever know anything like it?" and he really looked as if he were going to do something outrageous as a safety-valve for his excitement.

Years have passed since that red-letter day in Malcolm Stewart's life. He and Marian are now an old and comfortable married couple, with children around them who are learning from their parents' consistent example how good and pleasant a thing genuine Christianity is. Malcolm has now a dockyard appointment, so his days of adventure are over; but he is still a gallant officer in the service of the King of kings, "a modern Capt. Hedley Vicars" some of his old messmates call him. Never has he regretted his early choice of the best of Masters, nor the decision which seemed likely to cost him so much, but which he made so bravely when it became a question of principle.

Worship at Sea.—The Committee of the Missions to Seamen are inviting the co-operation of shipowners in the revival of the ancient custom of holding Divine worship in cargo ships on long voyages. Probably few things (they say) tend more to harmony, good fellowship, and good discipline afloat, besides the higher claim which the worship of Almighty God has on us all. Within living memory it was a common practice of many British shipowners to make it an article in the agreement that the crew should attend Divine worship on the Lord's Day, the captain causing such service to be conducted. During the last three years the Missions to Seamen has been liberally helped by the S.P.C.K. to provide 500 "Service Boxes," containing Bible, Prayer, and Hymn Books for issue to merchant ships, with the understanding that united worship should be regularly conducted by some one on board. Particulars may be had from Commander Dawson, secretary, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

The Children for Christ.

THE spiritual welfare of the children of Britain has been deeply engrossing the thoughts of many of God's people of late. The almost unanswerable question of to-day is: "How can we reach the lapsed masses?" But ought not a more answerable query to occupy our attention, namely: How to PREVENT lapsed masses? There are thousands of so-called "lapsed" young men and girls who were once within the reach of the Church, and over whom it has completely lost its influence.

Satisfactorily to solve the second query is far more easy than the first, and infinitely more important. Hundreds of children are packed off by their parents to the Sunday-schools "out of the way," and by those parents, too, who never darken the doors of either church or chapel. The key to both problems lies largely in at present under our influence. If a more spiritual and deciding influence were immediately brought to bear upon our Sunday-schools, the next generation of "lapsed masses" would be smaller, and the converted children would straightway commence to help in the evangelization of their own parents and persons in their own surroundings. If concerning the wolf, the lion, and the leopard, the influence of Christ's reign on earth shall accomplish that which is written, "a little child shall lead them" (Isa. xi. 6), how much more easily will the children, whose affections have been purified by Christ's love and life, win relatives and friends for Christ?

Have we reckoned enough on the power of God in the hearts of "little ones which believe in Me" (Matt. xviii. 6)? The day surely is past when pastors and deacons should entrust the eternal welfare of a Sunday-school child to anyone who can read them the lesson for the day, and then dole out portions of catchy stories, as is done, alas! in many a Sunday-school.

The second preventive method is to give

MORE SPIRITUAL HELP TO OUR VILLAGES.

Some of our best preachers, teachers, and missionaries came from humble villages where some godly man taught, or where, in spite of unhelpful surroundings, they had less opportunities to read other books than the Word of God. In my deputation work throughout the United Kingdom, I have not found such warm, earnest, well-attended prayer-meetings, nor such outpourings of soul for the coming Revival, as in certain parts of the south of Scotland where the "Shire Christian Unions" have started in nearly every village an interdenominational Evangelical union. Nearly every important village has its tri-monthly conference, generally on Saturday afternoons from 4 to 7 o'clock. Some of the best speakers are obtained to help forward the village people to a fuller life, with very satisfactory results.

Some of our Scotch brethren could tell us that of late, in proportion, more missionary volunteers hail from these country villages than from the towns. Why should not we do the same for our English country villages, that thus, instead of our village young men flooding our towns and lapsing themselves into the multitude of indifferent ones, their fresh country faith and earnest spiritual vigour would help our central churches to uplift our towns to a newer and brighter life? With the reopening of Cliff College, we hope to do something in this way for our Yorkshire and Derbyshire villages. Will anyone interested in this communicate with me?

Coloured Girls in South Africa.—Miss Anna M. Coote is now on her way back to South Africa with a party of thirty-two women and children—wives and families of men now in the colony, or girls going out to situations. Miss Coote's heart is full of praise for the way in which God has raised up in this country friends for the Home for Coloured Girls; and she goes with strong faith that all remaining difficulties will be removed. Letters may be addressed to her, care of Rev. D. H. Hay, East London, South Africa.

Dr. Torrey in India.

THE prayerful anticipations of blessing which had been created regarding the visit of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Charles Alexander to Calcutta (following their Madras mission) were more than realized.

FOR EUROPEANS AND EURASIANS.

It was Dr. Torrey's original intention to preach to English-speaking Bengali students, but as the Haskell lectures were being delivered by Dr. Cuthbert Hall on the dates contemplated, the plan was changed, and two weeks' meetings were conducted for Europeans and Eurasians. Mr. R. Harkness, the talented accompanist, was with the evangelists.

That a remarkable degree of interest was aroused is evident from the report and comments of The Indian Witness. Our esteemed contemporary says, "May we not believe that in this the hand of Providence, shutting one door and opening another, was distinctly manifest? Certainly many Europeans and Eurasians have abundant cause to thank God for Dr. Torrey's work among them. Of course, as is the case in all missions of the kind, a considerable proportion of persons who came out in his meetings were already connected with local churches as professing Christians. But an important outcome of every awakening and revival is the quickening anew of believers whose love had grown more or less cold, and who had become unfaithful in the service of Christ. Besides these we doubt not there must have been a goodly number of genuine conversions, but how many we have no means of knowing. The power of God was manifest in every meeting. At the closing meeting on Wednesday evening, November 19, there was a magnificent audience, the large hall being packed to overflowing and many new faces present, representatives, too of classes somewhat feebly represented in previous meetings.

"Apart from the direct results in conversions, were we asked to note the most marked effect or outcome of Dr. Torrey's meetings, we would be disposed to specify two lines on which blessed results followed, and will continue to follow, his teaching and preaching. One was the emphasis laid upon prayer as a practical factor in the spiritual life, both in regard to the personal experience of believers themselves and the influence they may wield in securing blessing for the world. The other was his insistence upon the believer's privilege and duty to be empowered by the Holy Spirit, not merely as an equipment for service in behalf of others, but as a necessity for living a life well-pleasing unto God. These points were pressed home with a cogency of Scripture proof and a wealth of practical illustration from his own experience and observation that made them very forcible and impressive. To this may be added his presentation of the duty of consistent public confession of Christ. Let these things — open confession, unceasing prayerfulness, and the power of the Holy Spirit in the life—be part and parcel of the believer's experience, and successful work for Christ will surely result.

"Dr. Torrey impressed himself upon all as a true man of God, living apart from the world, and wholly intent upon pleasing his Divine Master. We sincerely trust that he and his colleague may realize their heart's desire, to see the salvation of God come with mighty power in India in connection with their earnest labours."

AWAKENING AT BOMBAY.

"The great Town Hall in Bombay," writes Mr. Maurice Gregory, "has been filled night after night during the week ending November 29, to hear Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander. Numbers of Hindus and Parsees have been present, an entirely new feature in such gatherings. The morning meetings for Christian workers in the fine new premises of the Y.W.C.A. have been times of much blessing." The Bombay Guardian says: "It was manifest in all the meetings that Dr. Torrey was deeply impressed with the truth of what he taught, and the message was delivered with a power that carried conviction to the hearts of his hearers. The evening meetings at the Town Hall have been well attended, and one very noticeable feature, which occurred night after night as some climax was reached, was the simultaneous filing out of most of the Parsees and Hindus from the audience. The reality of the unseen, and the unreality of earthly hopes and possessions were set forth so vividly that none could have listened and remained indifferent."

MR. ALEXANDER'S SINGING.

"To many the first attraction of the meetings was the singing of Mr. Chas. Alexander. He has an excellent baritone voice which fills the large Town Hall, with apparently no effort to himself. His solos are simple, both in music and verse, but they touch the heart, and the refrain runs through the memory as persistently as does the air of a popular song. But Mr. Alexander's chief desire seems to be to make his audience sing; he good humouredly talks and teaches, first making them sing the chorus and then the verse of a new hymn until the hall is filled with melody and everyone smilingly taking part. It is long since there was such singing in Bombay. Mr. Alexander, in telling how he became a Gospel song leader, says:—'My father was musical, and I got the ambition to be a band conductor when I was a boy. I used to dream of conducting great bands or great choirs, and always had a conviction that somewhere or somehow it would come about. After I was converted I reckoned that I would devote my life to Gospel singing; and I don't see why these great musical effects should not be brought into the Lord's work.'"

RETROSPECTIVE AND PROSPECTIVE.

In the course of an interesting communication which breathes thankfulness for the past and hopefulness regarding the future, Dr. Torrey writes: "If we could only have spent several months in India, giving three weeks or even more to each place, it would have been a time of great opportunity and blessing. Even as it is God is blessing His word everywhere, and Europeans, Eurasians, and natives are turning to God. We have decided, if God opens the way, to spend several months in England and Scotland. We would rather give three weeks or a month each to a few places, than a week or ten days to more. In New Zealand we gave only ten days to each place, and although there was a very great awakening in each place, it was felt by the local pastors (and we fully agreed with them) that if we could only have spent three weeks in each place, much more could have been accomplished. We would like just as wide a union as possible wherever we go. The Church of England ministers have co-operated with us in Australia and New Zealand, and often have been our best helpers. God has bestowed upon Mr. Alexander a remarkable gift as a choir leader. We have had enormous choirs, the one in Melbourne, with 1,250 voices, being the largest. Untold good has been accomplished by the singing. Though much money has been required for the rent of halls and other expenses, it has come without great effort, and there has been, I think, a surplus in every city. I hope that there may be much prayer, emphasising the fact that prayer has been the most prominent human factor in the work everywhere."

An Evangelical Inquiry.

SIR,—It is remarkable that much Gospel preaching is in Old Testament language. What is the New Testament equivalent or explanation of the Psalmist's prayer, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow"? (Psa. li. 7)? How do these words enforce upon our hearers the faith which justifies and saves? What did Ananias mean when he said to Saul of Tarsus, "Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord?" (Acts xxii. 16). An answer will be helpful to more than one EVANGELIST.

"You'd Nearly Forgot!"

A TOUCHING little article appeared in the Echo of the 11th inst., entitled, "The Londoner," by Mr. Pett Ridge. After depicting in a serio-humorous manner the characteristics of a typical denizen of our great city, the writer continues:—

"One night as he was going to his comfortable home, grumbling under the fur-lined collar of his overcoat at the bitter wind, and trying once more to discover what was wrong, he heard a cry. It was a little cry, because it came from a Little Person. The Little Person was huddled up in the recess of a shop door. The Londoner stopped, for he remembered that he was fond of children.

"'Now then! now then!' he said, in a gruff, good-tempered way. 'What's all this about? Why don't you run off home?'

"'If you had my 'ome,' said the Little Person, shrilly, 'you wouldn't run off to it.'

"'But you're shivering!'

"'I do that for fun!'

"'And you have been crying.'

"'I laugh so much,' said the Little Person, rubbing hands and trembling.

"'Your boots are coming all to pieces,' said the Londoner, sternly.

"'It's fash'nable to wear 'em like that in our set.'

"The Londoner stooped down and patted the Little Person's face. In that moment the tears came again.

"'I say! I say!' declared the Londoner, with much concern, 'I'd no idea anybody suffered so much as this.'

"'You knew,' said the shivering Little Person; 'you knew, but—but you'd nearly forgot!'

"Whilst the Little Person was being warmed and fed and amused at the very nearest shop, the Londoner, enjoying it all as much as his guest did, pondered over this remark. He walked up and down the eating-house, and gradually illumination came into his mind. 'You knew,' he repeated to himself more than once; 'you knew, but you nearly forgot. You knew, but you nearly ——'

"'Now,' cried the Londoner, opening his purse, with great delight, 'now that I see what's the matter with me, I can soon find a remedy.'"

Evangelical Alliance Conference.

DEAR SIR,—In his brief notice of what I said at Folkestone at the Evangelical Alliance Conference, your commissioner has somewhat misrepresented me, and the truth involved is of the highest importance. He says I "described redemption as the work of atonement, and reconciliation as the effect of atonement." What I actually said was:—

On this subject there are three principal lines of truth in Scripture connected with three leading words: Redemption (apolutrosis), Reconciliation (katallagê), and Propitiation (hilasmos). Redemption is a work accomplished by the death of Christ. Reconciliation (or atonement) is a continuing work based upon that death. And Propitiation is not a work at all, but what Christ is as seated at the right hand of God. And I went on to illustrate these several truths by reference to the types, explaining that Christ is the propitiation (hilasmos) because He is the antitype of the mercy seat (hilastèrion, Rom. iii. 25), and of the priest whose part it was to make atonement for sin (hilaskesthai, Heb. ii. 17).— Yours faithfully, ROBERT ANDERSON.

Bristol Conference.—A call to the twenty-seventh annual Conference of Believers at Bristol, states that the meetings will be held on January 13 and 14 in the Gospel Hall, St. Nicholas Road. On January 13 gatherings have been arranged for 11, 3, and 7, and on the 14th for 11, 2.45, and 6.30. On the second day at a meeting for sisters only, accounts are to be given of women's work in other lands. Particulars may be obtained from Mr. W. F. Higgins, 107, Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Home Missions.

The St. Giles' Mission.

As the fine old chapel in Little Wild Street is now in course of demolition, the annual winter meeting of the friends of discharged prisoners this year took place at the Olympic, Wych Street. Sir Albert de Rutzen, J.P., presided as Chief Metropolitan Police Magistrate. Alderman Strong, in course of a statement, said that while the new building was in course of erection near the site of the old one, the Olympic would be the headquarters of much of the work of the Mission, and all would wish Mr. Wheatley and his helpers a continuance of that success which hitherto had marked their labours. The work had gone on for nearly forty-three years among the poorest and most unfortunate classes, and had been the means of uplifting thousands who had fallen into evil courses, and a large number of neglected young persons had been saved from becoming criminals. They aimed at the formation of character in the young and at its reformation in those who were older. The greatest of all factors for the attainment of their aim was the religion of Christ, although better secular education, technical training, temperance, and decent housing, had a not unimportant place.

SOME STRIKING FIGURES.

Their methods were the same that they had been — discharged prisoners were warned, advised, and helped to turn from dishonourable to honourable pursuits; boys were saved from crime; women and girls were rescued; the suffering wives and children of prisoners were relieved, while over a thousand children were taught in the Sunday-schools, children's services, and bands of hope. The prison section was commenced in 1877; in a quarter of a century about 422,000 free breakfasts had been given; 109,000 discharged prisoners had been assisted to make a fresh start, and over 97,000 had signed the pledge. Reference was made to the liberated convicts who were assisted, all being treated as human beings who needed sympathy and kindliness.

Sir Albert de Rutzen spoke of Mr. Wheatley as the best friend the magistrates had. The work was brought to a state of perfection not known in any other country. He was in daily contact with Mr. Wheatley, and when magistrates turned to him to come to their aid, he never failed. Nor was he ever discouraged. A boy had been taken five times; that redounded to his credit. The chief magistrate described a round of visits he had made to St. Giles' Mission stations; he saw everything; he never saw anything better. He came away pleased with the provision made, and, in reference to what was done for boys, added, that if that were all it would be one of the best institutions ever founded. There were 500 boys; they did well; many did uncommonly well.

In the course of a brief statement, Mr. Wheatley expressed gratitude to employers of labour who took into their service the men and boys. Without such help they could do nothing, and could not be too thankful. In each case the antecedents of the person were made known. About ninety per cent. of the lads turned out well.

A resolution having reference to the blessing which had attended the work, was moved by Mr. Loveland-Loveland, K.C., and was seconded by Sir W. T. Charley, K.C. The former said he had seen the work, and recalling some unfavourable reports, added that he should be glad if such critics would come to him, and he would show that all was as it should be. It was a national work, which all should help. Lady de Rutzen distributed the good-conduct prizes to those in situations, the time of service ranging from one to nine years.

The National Purity Crusade.

THE National Purity Crusade, which is being conducted by the National Vigilance Association, is being well received and supported. The Crusade has already visited Birmingham and most of the surrounding suburbs, Stratford-on-Avon, Tamworth, Redditch, Leamington, Sunderland, South Shields, Manchester and district, Preston, Blackburn, Wigan, Urmston, Bolton, Rochdale, St. Helens, Altrincham, Southport, Liverpool, and is engaged for another fortnight in Manchester itself. In almost every place visited there has been awakened a deep and public interest in purity work.

The principal citizens have met, generally in the Town Hall or Council Chamber, often under the presidency of the Mayor, in his chains of office, or other official representative, the vicar, or leading Nonconformist minister, to hear the story of the work accomplished, and to consider what needs to be done by the nation, by the English Parliament, by the local authorities, the Christian Churches, and by parents, in suppressing vice, amending the laws, and in the moral training of the children. Ladies and gentlemen have gladly, sincerely, and publicly welcomed the crusade. All the meetings have been addressed by local friends and by Mr. James Marchant, while Mr. William Alexander Coote has also taken part in the principal ones.

The various platforms have been the scene of a happy union of the churches in these days of stress and strife. Ministers of every denomination have joined in their effort to purify the moral atmosphere. There have been stirring meetings for men only, for mothers, and for older girls (addressed by Mrs. Walter Priestman, who has been a very acceptable speaker), and for both sexes.

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

The story of the White Slave Traffic and Mr. Coote's wonderful and romantic pilgrimage to the capitals of Europe, of the recent Frankfort Congress, and the necessity for the formation of an international code, have come to many with the shock of a cruel revelation. Magistrates and well-informed citizens, even of large cities, have expressed utmost and painful surprise that such a traffic existed. The amendments of the Criminal Law Amendment Act—the abolition of the "reasonable cause to believe" clause, and the extension of the three months' limit to six months — have been vigorously advocated by doctors and lawyers, mothers and young men; and at every meeting a resolution has been unanimously and enthusiastically carried—many women of the poorer classes holding up both hands—calling upon Parliament to pass these amendments, and has been sent to the local M.P. or the Home Secretary. A strong public opinion in favour of these improvements is steadily rising.

The local Press has not fought shy of the subject. Almost without exception, all the papers have sent reporters and have reported the speeches at unusual length. In two or three of the towns visited, where some special local need was manifest, the Crusade has been made the occasion by local speakers of directing public light upon it, and the Press has always improved the occasion.

The Crusade has not yet visited a single city or town where it has not been urged to return, and the local ministers have again and again invited the Crusade to visit their congregations, Christian Endeavour, and men's meetings alike. The subject is being lifted from under the ban, and is receiving a public recognition which speaks well for the future of the cause. Prayer centres and local purity interest are being established, and purity literature is being circulated at afternoon conferences, drawing-room meetings, and public gatherings.

A further significant sign of the times is the demand for purity literature suitable for the home and for youths, whilst there is an actual thirst for accurate information and sound advice shown by all sections of the people on the question of public morals. The great social evil is felt to be a great public burden, and the cry against bad books, pictures, mutoscopes, and certain illustrated papers, is painful, deep, and widespread. The people at these meetings have demanded the suppression of these things, the cleansing of the streets, and the purification of places of amusement. The name of Mr. Holt, of Manchester, is everywhere received with cheers. The people heartily welcome discreet and common-sense speaking upon these matters of life or death to their children. The outstanding lesson of this Crusade is that the policy of silence on these subjects is an utterly mistaken one, in the opinion of all who have attended, and is openly denounced.

In this connection it is opportune to announce that we have in the press a popular text-book on Public morals, covering the whole duty of the State, the Church, the parent, and the individual. The writers include:—Bishop Barry, Rev. Dr. Townsend, Mr. W. A. Coote, Mr. Percy Bunting, Miss Blanche Leppington, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Canon the Hon. E. Lyttelton, Mrs. Ormiston Chant, Dr. Harry Guinness, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, and Dr. Barnardo; while an appendix deals with the chief causes of and remedies for the social evil, contributed by Mrs. Josephine Butler, Mrs. Fawcett, Dr. Monro Gibson, Rev. Dr. Horton, Sir R. Anderson, Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace, Dean Hole, Dean Kitchen, Miss Frances Power Cobbe, Mr. Reader Harris, K.C., and Lord Kinnaird. An introduction is contributed by the Bishop of Rochester, and the work is edited by James Marchant, Deputation Secretary, National Vigilance Association, who commenced the work during the Chatham Crusade in 1901, which will be remembered by our readers. In the course of his introduction the Bishop says:—

> The book is one which all who care for the morality of our nation would wish to read, which every reputable critic would respect, and which would be a strong reinforcement and resource to those who give thought and toil to the bettering of their country, its children and its youth.
> It would be difficult to compile a stronger or more representative list of those who have earned the right to speak upon the matter. I cannot doubt that such a book must tell powerfully for good. I cannot deny myself the offered pleasure of associating myself with the writers.
> The writers in this volume have, in their several ways, brought their contributions to this Christian and chivalrous crusade . . . unlike and separated in in many things, they are here at one. It might be an honour to anyone to introduce them to the welcome which their own worth will demand, and, especially in this time of strife and division, I cannot persuade myself to decline it.

The whole work is a labour of love. It will be published very shortly. Our object is one with the writer's to provide the growing army of social purity workers with a sound, readable text-book. The welcome already given to the volume, as will be seen in our advertisement columns, bespeaks for it a very large circulation. Orders can now be received by our trade department. We want some of our readers to help us in circulating this much-needed book, by ordering copies for distribution. Every minister should have a copy at once. This is a unique opportunity of helping the cause of public morals. (Morgan & Scott. 1s. and 1s. 6d. net.)

Your Only Hope.—God is the only final dream of man. Door after door opens; there is no final chamber till we come where He sits. All that ought to be done in the world has a right to know itself as finally done for Him. It is God, and the discovery of Him in life, and the certainty that He has plans for our lives, and is doing something with them, that gives us a true, deep sense of movement, and lets us always feel the power and delight of unknown coming things.—Phillips Brooks.

What Invalids can do.—Twenty-four years ago the Invalids' Auxiliary to the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society was formed, and it has been their privilege during that time to hand over to Medical Missions at home and abroad between £2,000 and £3,000—the result of an annual sale of work—the great proportion of which is done by invalids. Readers who are "shut-ins," and do not already belong to a similar society, are invited to send to Miss Sym, 21, Belgrave Crescent, Edinburgh, for a copy of the last report, and to join the Auxiliary. They will find there is a double blessing (1) to themselves in quickening and extending their interest in, and prayerfulness for, medical missionaries, and (2) in the cheer that the gifts and prayers of home invalids carry to those who are bearing the burden and heat of the day.

China-John: or "What's the Good?"

By T. J. BARNARDO, F.R.C.S.Ed.

JOHN was a privateer shoeblack. His box was slung by a piece of string over his shoulders. Though he lived by cleaning them, he had a mild scorn for the wearing of boots, and he went always barefooted himself. His dress was quite unorthodox, consisting seemingly of orts and shreds of clothing, instead of what we usually regard as legitimate garments! Verily, a latter-day Ishmael at first glance! But there was a brightness in John's eye and a sauciness in his sharp face, with its tip-tilted nose, that indicated character and arrested my attention, and I felt myself drawn to him!

The first thing to be done was to let him black my boots, which he did with vigour and infinite gusto, answering my questions meanwhile, and probably speculating as to whether his communicativeness would be duly rewarded with an extra tip. Nor was he disappointed! And that was the beginning of our acquaintance.

When I heard John's story from beginning to end, which was not accomplished without many encounters, I knew that I was face to face with a unique specimen of the genus Street-Arab, one of the dwellers in No Man's Land, a genuine Waif and Stray, one of Nobody's Children. Yet an independent little rascal withal was John, having opinions of his own, and determined, above all else, to "get on" in life. His great ideal, I found, was to go to sea. After that he could not say what he would do or be, but he was sure something would turn up, and he would take advantage of it, no fear! He was, at all events, sure of himself, and he was, amidst all his rags and tatters,

AN OPTIMIST OF THE FIRST WATER!

That interview led to others; and finally I caught John, greatly to my delight, for I recognised the good material that was in him. In due course, he was admitted to my busy hive. But in those early days (I speak of many years ago) our space was more limited than now, and we were often crowded out; so I was glad to pass him on for a time to my Shoeblack Brigade. There he attained the dignity of a regular uniform and a regular "pitch." He got some amount of education at the night school, and was, generally speaking, well looked after. But I did not give up my personal interest in him. He used to come round on Sunday afternoons to my Bible-class at the Home, and he and I became fast friends.

John throve apace in his new environment, and grew in time to be a great fellow. After about a year he had developed into such a hardy youth that he told me in confidence he could "whack any fellow in the Row." My counsels of peace had evidently not as yet produced a large harvest! Nevertheless, realizing the splendid stuff that was in him, I re-admitted John from the Brigade to the permanent benefits of the Stepney Home, where the training was more thorough.

But the time of full harvest was not yet. Shall I ever forget it when it came? Imagine yourself, if you can, in a narrow court named Hope Place, by the "World's End," Stepney, as we used to call it. In those early days, before the School Boards had begun to be, when Bumble reigned supreme in the workhouse, and ere ever the public conscience had been properly stirred up to its duty with regard to the boys and girls of the streets, I rented a room as a Sunday ragged school, which was crowded with children of the labouring poor. What a harvest-field, had there only been labourers enough! Were children ever so closely packed, I wonder, in any room before or since? I doubt it! How did we breathe? Move we could not! I was wedged up. "Teacher," one would call,

"THEY'RE SQUEEDGING OF ME!"

Another would interrupt, "Teacher, I can't breave!" Nor was this much of an exaggeration, for I could hardly "breave" myself.

But what a gracious visitation we had in that little overcrowded room! God blessed to the full that humble little effort to tell the story of His grace to sinful men. How shall I even attempt to describe, at this distance of years, the deep sense of the Divine presence that fell upon us all—the teacher and the taught; or the sweet persuasiveness of the promises of Scripture, when young hearts were made thirsty for the waters of life!

And among all those pairs of eyes so intently fixed on my face throughout those evenings, especially on one memorable occasion, none were more immovable than John's. And, oh, the prayer-meeting that followed, when we had thinned out our crowd, and a small, serious, happy group knelt together on the bare floor in that dingy room! There we yielded ourselves up to Christ's happy service! There was a wondrous self-surrender of young spirits, a softened look on the hard faces of rough lads who had always hitherto acted as if their first duty was to take their own part and to get the best of everything for themselves. And to see now their yieldingness, their sincerity, their devotion and their obedience to the heavenly vision, was in itself a message to one's heart!

Among them all, none was apparently more graciously impressed than John. There and then, at one of our earliest meetings, he entered into the light, and manfully confessed his new Master. The things of darkness were gone, for him, for ever. He was now a child of day! He walked home with some dozen of us that night, for the lads would not let me go, and I with them wended my way to my lodgings near the London Hospital in the Whitechapel Road. We sang aloud in the open street, as we went, grand old hymns to express our new-found joy. People who passed us wondered a little, but we were not interrupted, for East-End folk mostly evince the deadly calm born of indifference and weariness. Then outside my door the farewell words were spoken, and, with our heads bared, we stood up in the open air, while from each young heart a silent prayer arose. And then, "Good-bye." That was

JOHN'S BIRTH-NIGHT.

After that, to see the strides John made in religion and in knowledge of all kinds was amazing! Reading and writing, once seemingly impossible acquisitions, were now quickly mastered, and the mysteries of grammar and arithmetic were soon acquired. Now I saw more of him, and daily watched with infinite delight the dawning of great natural powers. Among other traits, he manifested, to my amazement, a wondrous facility for acquiring languages! The first intimation thereof was on this wise. A rule of the house was that, having left the dormitories in the mornings, no inmate could return until the hour for bed at night. One day, passing through one of the bedrooms, I saw a figure which had been bending over a bed dart swiftly away. That bed I promptly examined. It was John's, and at first my search was fruitless; but presently, under the mattress, my fingers encountered a book evidently just thrust there for concealment. I drew it out. Judge of my amazement when I discovered a well-worn, well-thumbed Greek Grammar! John had bought it for 2d. on a barrow in Whitechapel. He had already mastered the declensions, and within its pages I found a very respectable exercise in his own writing. Of course, after this I threshed the subject well out with John, and got him aid from a worthy and competent instructor. The latter "taught school" in an adjoining street, and began to take great pride in John's progress, whose Latin, Greek, and French work soon proved that he possessed in no ordinary degree "the gift of tongues." Little did I then imagine what an effect all this was to have on John's future career. Hardly less wonderful were the moral and spiritual developments which manifested themselves in this erstwhile vagrant shoeblack of Salmon's Lane and Donkey Row.

But the Bible was his especial study—his one Book. It was to him like a field in which was "a hidden treasure." He dug it over day by day, and his search never went unrewarded. Though he was a poor outcast lad, son of a drunken Irish costermonger, it was an unanswerable argument in favour of the Divine origin of the Great Message, to see his rough, common features refined and almost glorified by the new influences at work upon his life.

In due season, when the years were bringing John near to manhood, I got him a situation as a groom with a well-known servant of Christ, Mr. W. T., and subsequently with his son, Mr. H. T., residing at Barnet. Here John steadily pursued his linguistic studies, all the time learning from the highest source more and more of God, and obtaining a truer knowledge of His ways. And then the yearning to lead others to Christ, always manifest in him since he entered into the light, became a consuming passion, growing stronger and stronger each day. His ambition grew to great heights. Why should not even he go out to the heathen? But he was very modest, and deeply deplored his lack of general education. One night he said to me, sadly: "No Missionary Society would have me, sir. I have no learning. But CAN'T I GO OUT AND WORK?"

This soon became the burden of all his thoughts, and the settled object of all his plans and prayers: to be able to sustain himself by some secular occupation while labouring for the Lord. And so John went to China! From time to time I had news of him. He had obtained admission into the service of the Chinese Government; there he had advanced step by step, and had become a superior officer. He had mastered the language and was steadily rising, for he was trustworthy and trusted. He had even been employed by the Chinese in some most delicate and important negotiations with the representatives of other nations! Surely "He lifteth the beggar from the dunghill and setteth him among princes."

As he rose he had more time on his hands for his Master's work, and his heart was still steadfast in its purpose to surrender his best upon the altar that sanctifieth the gift! I had received during many years divers sums of money from John, to be devoted to good causes. Needless to add, the old Homes which had sheltered him in his hour of need were not forgotten, and John loved to send me at the close of each year the surplus which remained after defraying all needful charges.

And then, after long years of absence, quite unexpectedly John came back to London and called to see me. I heard in detail the wonderful story of his life, the life of an unpaid, honorary and most successful missionary among classes of the Chinese whom many even of the official missionaries could not reach. My heart was gladdened by this fresh assurance of the seal which our Lord had given to labours in themselves so imperfect and unworthy.

Have any of my readers been tempted to ask: "What's the good of it all?" "NOT IN VAIN IN THE LORD" is the Divine comfort and promise which must ever sustain the heart which rests on Him, and is content to do His bidding even amid obloquy and odium!

Nor is John's the only case in the thirty-six years' story of the Homes which illustrates the mighty power of the Gospel. Seventeen devoted missionaries at this moment in the foreign field owe their first inspiration to give themselves to our Lord's work abroad to the teaching and influences which they enjoyed when in the Homes; while not a few, in recognized ministries of the Established and Free Churches at home and in the Colonies, are labouring with the same end in view, to bring about the fulfilment of the petition: "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done in earth, as it is in Heaven." To-day I am asking our Father to use His Homes under my care more than ever heretofore, so that they may become literally "schools of the prophets." Why should there not rise up from the ranks of the 6,281 Boys and Girls to-day under my care, all rescued from squalor and sin, many workers who may at home and abroad be distinguished by their zeal and devotion to Christ's service?

To use these rescued children, when they themselves have become Christ's, in spreading the good tidings is but after all to revert to Apostolic methods. For they who "went everywhere preaching the Word" had first of all "given their own selves to the Lord!"

A Spanish Mission.

PASTOR AND MADAME LOPEZ RODRIGUEZ.

THOUGH Madame Lopez Rodriguez and her sister, Mrs. Stewart Mathias, née Murray, were the daughters of an Indian officer, and born in the East, they passed their early years in an English country rectory. Subsequently they were placed in Moravian schools in England and Germany, the simple religious influence of which produced excellent results. They left the latter to join their parents, who were returning from India, their step-father, Colonel Baynes, having retired from the army.

When quite young, both sisters were converted, and, on leaving a finishing London school, were confirmed, desiring with all their hearts to be Christ's "faithful soldiers and servants to their lives' end." The following week they were taken by their parents to a military ball. Apparently enjoying the brilliant scene, they were sad at heart, feeling that so far from keeping their solemn promise to "renounce the world," they had taken the first step into a vortex of gaiety. While driving home, they opened their hearts to their parents, begging that it might be their last ball, which proved to be the case.

A year or two later, the family settled in Kensington Park Gardens, and the sisters soon found plenty of congenial occupation in connection with the Y.W.C.A., a coffee palace, and, best loved of all, the Bible Flower Mission. Miss Macpherson, that noble rescuer of waifs and strays, kindly lent a room in her Home of Industry, for a depôt, and the Misses Murray quickly gathered round them a goodly band of young ladies of independent means to visit the London hospitals and workhouses, giving bouquets and texts to the patients and inmates. What untold pleasure the flowers gave! Eternity alone will reveal the results of the SWEET MESSAGES OF A SAVIOUR'S LOVE.

One afternoon the sisters set out with baskets laden with fragrant flowers for the sufferers in Moorfields Hospital. Seeing a new patient, Miss Murray was about to address him, when the nurse remarked, "It is of no use giving him a text, for he is a Roman Catholic, and besides, he can't speak English." "I will at least offer him a little bouquet," answered the young lady. But what about a text? Surely it was the Lord's ordering that for the first time she had brought a French one. Hoping that the patient understood that language, and selecting a pretty bunch of flowers, she offered it with a silent prayer for help and blessing. The Spaniard was cheered by the roses, and listened attentively to the text, a most appropriate one: "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus." After pointing him to the great High Priest, she asked if he would accept a Spanish Bible. He replied in fluent French, expressing gratitude for her kindness, but politely, yet firmly, declining the proffered gift, adding, "It is a bad, forbidden book; besides, to-morrow morning I shall leave the hospital."

On reaching home, Miss Murray found that there was to be a dinner-party that night, thus making it most difficult for her to procure the promised Spanish Bible. After trying at several shops, she went back to the first one, and begged the man to "have another look." On a top shelf, thick with dust, he found a second-hand copy of the much-desired Book. The post office being closed, the next difficulty was to get it taken to the City. This was met by Miss Murray persuading one of her father's guests to take the precious volume to the Moorfields Eye Hospital that night. Señor Prévi, the Spaniard, received and took it away with him, and, impelled by an irresistible impulse, at once

BEGAN TO STUDY ITS SACRED PAGES.

Six months passed by, and again the tall Spaniard was a patient in the Eye Hospital. Warmly greeting the flower ladies, he said: "I have read that book you gave me, and have found in it la vérité." "But what do you think is la vérité?" inquired the visitor. "It is all in one text," he replied; "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus." The seed had fallen into "good ground," for the reality of his conversion was subsequently proved by his devoting time after business to distributing Gospels and tracts on board Spanish vessels. His faith was severely tested by a letter from his uncle, in whose charge Don Domingo Prévi, captain of the port of Malaga, had left his only son, shortly before his death. The letter contained a promise from the uncle to hand over the patrimony left to his nephew if the latter would give up the Protestant faith; but should he refuse to do so, the property would be given to the Church. Señor Prévi positively declined to comply, "esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches" than his father's wealth or his uncle's favour.

After a time, he expressed a strong desire to carry the Gospel into a part of Spain (alas! there are many) where it had never been preached, and in due course was received into Harley House Missionary College preparatory to going forth. This he did, accompanied by a fellow-student. For three years Señor Prévi laboured devotedly, and founded, with remarkable success, the Figueras Mission, till called "Home" to his bright reward. A week or two after his death, his companion returned to his own country, and temporary workers were obtained, till Pastor Lopez Rodriguez became director of the Mission. Miss Murray, accompanied by her sister and some lady friends, spent two winters in Figueras, she being anxious to devote herself to the work, especially among the women and girls. In 1882 a double wedding took place in St. John's Church, Notting Hill—that of Miss Murray to Rev. Luis Lopez Rodriguez, and her sister, Miss Georgina Murray, to Rev. J. C. Stewart Mathias, youngest son of Archdeacon Mathias.

Pastor and Madame Lopez Rodriguez were joined in their work by Don Alexander, the pastor's brother (afterwards the editor of El Heraldo) with other Spanish workers; also, later on, by Miss Nora Kerr, of Paisley, and Miss Jessie Haigh, of Eastbourne. These much-valued and beloved lady "helpers" have laboured at Figueras, the former for sixteen years, the latter for thirteen years. Colonel Baynes acted for seven years as hon. treasurer of the Mission, for the financial part of which his daughter had made herself responsible. As soon as public subscriptions were received, a report, with donation list and balance-sheet, was issued. The death, in 1889, of this kind and liberal supporter of the Mission, was a great loss to the work in Spain. Since then, "the grain of mustard seed" has become "a great tree," whose branches have spread not only over the entire province of Gerona, but by means of the throughout the whole country, and among other Spanish-speaking peoples. The following branches of work are carried on:—Evangelization in the province of Gerona (population 400,000), Sunday, week-day, and evening schools, mothers' meetings, Y.W.C.A., training of students, printing and circulation of Scriptures, publication of El Heraldo (illustrated paper), books, tracts, &c.; medical mission—two doctors employed, average yearly attendance from 2,000 to 3,000; visits made since the work was started, 26,185.

We come to the story of the pastor. One evening in the year 1868, a Spanish gentleman asked his wife and two sons to accompany him to a secret Protestant meeting, to be held in Madrid. The revolutionary spirit abroad made such expeditions perilous, so it was with considerable reluctance that the lady complied. Making their way through dimly-lighted streets, they at length reached their destination, ascending a dark staircase, and were admitted into a small room where a few persons were assembled. A gentleman named Don Pedro Castro sat at the head of the table, on which lay some copies of the Gospel by John. The result of the reunion was the conversion of that lady and her two sons, Don Luis and Don Alexander Lopez Rodriguez, who from that time have been faithful and earnest labourers for Christ. For the last twenty years they have worked in the Figueras Mission, and God has blessed their efforts.

The only son of Pastor and Madame Lopez Rodriguez, Don Luis, is being educated in the Figueras Institute. In "Letter from Spain," No. XXX., his mother writes:—"It was a 'red-letter day' on which our dear boy entered on his university career. He, with two other lads from our school in this town, were the first Protestants who ever studied in that most ancient of all Spanish institutes. They attend all the classes except Doctrina, which is, of course, Roman Catholic. Fortunately the professors of geometry, history, chemistry, and mathematics are personal friends of the pastor, and hold Liberal views; but the principal, who is Latin professor and a fanatical Carlist, at first looked on the young 'heretics' with no friendly eye. For a whole year they were forced to occupy a separate bench in the classes, while the students delighted in greeting them with the convent song —'Protestants of the bad race, may you break your necks on the way to the Plaza!'"

Warned against retaliation towards fellow-students, also strictly enjoined to show especial courtesy out of class, and best attention and deference in class to the ultramontane professors, the boys were forearmed with advice and prayer. It was a satisfaction when, at one of the classes, the professor, pointing to them, said, 'These gentlemen are an example to you all for punctuality, application, and industry.' The Latin professor thawed, and "as to the boys, they are very jolly now," says Luis, "and I will tell you how I got round them—by exchanging English stamps," of which he is a collector. Thus prejudice is being lived down, and "evil overcome with good." Having obtained his B.A. degree at Barcelona University, Don Luis is now studying at Glasgow, and the prayers of friends are solicited on his behalf.

Gospels for Chinese Students.

By Mr. JOHN ARCHIBALD, Hankow.

The following description of the distribution of Gospels and other Christian literature among students attending the great Provincial Examination at Changsha, the capital of Hunan Province, China, September 11, is quoted from a letter by Mr. John Archibald, agent at Hankow of the National Bible Society of Scotland.

THE Changsha distribution was a great success, although it was very nearly prevented; for in consequence of the murder of the two C.I.M. brethren at Chenchow, the officials sent a despatch requesting us not to attempt Hunan this time. This despatch, however, did not reach Hankow till I was already on the way, and when they found I was actually there, they did everything in their power for us, with the result that we had no trouble at all.

Our first business was to get the missionaries together and make our arrangements. There was no difficulty about this. At the hour appointed, eight of us met, together with an official from the Yamen (Bureau of Foreign Affairs), and we soon had all settled. The official wished the distribution to be managed as quietly as possible, and by natives only, while we desired to be present, and to be seen by all. There were 12,000 B.A.'s in the examination hall—the cream of the Hunan literati. Coming, as they did, from the most distant parts of the province, from every city and town in it, many of them never having seen a foreigner before, to see us all there at such a time would be an object-lesson, the meaning of which none would fail to understand.

It is true our proposal seemed a little risky. No distribution had ever been attempted at Changsha before, for the sufficient reason that at the time of the last M.A. examination—now five years ago—and for all time previously, it was as much as any foreigner's life was worth to try to enter Changsha. How the students would take it, it was impossible to say. However, the officials agreed to our proposal, and we arranged to be at the hall door, all hands, bag and baggage, at ten a.m., about which time the sealed doors would be opened for the students to come out after their first bout of thirty-six hours in the cells of the examination hall.

BIBLE AND TRACT WORK UNITED.

The "baggage" consisted of 8,000 packets of books and 2,000 magazines—the whole weighing over a ton, and representing a money value of close on £100. Each packet was neatly done up in paper, with a red band pasted round it conveying good wishes. Each contained a copy of—An "Annotated" Gospel. "The Gate of Wisdom and Virtue," by Dr. Griffith John. "Religious Toleration," by the Viceroy Chang Chih Tung. "On the Nature of God," a tract by Dr. John. "Creation and Redemption," a sermon by Bishop Cranston. "Anti-Footbinding," small books by various native writers. John iii. 16, with comment.

This represented a considerable library from a Chinaman's point of view. Eight thousand similar packets were distributed at Wuchang, and 2,000 more at Nanchang, making 18,000 libraries in all. The Bible Society of Scotland furnished the Scriptures, and also met the distribution expenses; but a heavier charge fell on the Central China Tract Society, which provided the rest of the literature (with the exception of a Diffusion Society book and magazines), and almost bankrupted itself in doing so.

Our men stood at the side of the door along with the soldiers on guard, and handed a packet to each student, which in almost every case was politely received. It was soon seen that no danger was to be apprehended from these men, so we were soon permitted to distribute books ourselves, and to move about amongst the crowd as we pleased. The work went on till we, as well as the books, were quite exhausted. When we left, the students were still pouring out of the hall as fast as ever. Not a single "regrettable incident" marred the day's proceedings.

The Changsha missionaries were greatly delighted that all went off so well. The native Christians, who had toiled in the sweltering crowd till they were ready to drop, were simply overjoyed that such an opportunity had been given them for "witnessing" before their officials and the literati. The officials, from the governor downward, were exceedingly thankful that the attempt had been made and made successfully. Lastly, the students themselves were pleased. Many of them bowed their thanks, and several turned aside to express them verbally.

TO MY FRIENDS AND HELPERS BY PRAYER.

Jamaica, November 22, 8 a.m.

WE are steaming along the south coast of Jamaica, whose beautifully-wooded heights are in sight, as I sit under the awning of the deck, in the temperature of a midsummer day. (The bugle has just given the first call for breakfast, and we must be ready soon after to disembark.)

The first week of voyage was wet and stormy, and we are in consequence a day late. We shall not soon forget "the roaring forties." Day after day the great Atlantic breakers rolled under us, and the rain and wind made it almost impossible to keep on deck. But all is forgotten. (Thank God for the short-lived memory of pain and discomfort!)

The last week has been lovely! Glorious sunrises and sunsets, silvery and glassy seas, exquisite moonlight and starlight. Our cabin being fairly high in the vessel, and on the south side, we have been able to watch the sunrise and the moonlight without going on deck, and to have the port open day and night.

The voyage has been interesting in many ways. The governor of Jamaica with his family are on board; he has shown us marked courtesy. There are also several sincere Christians among the passengers and crew; and there is the endless interest of the opportunities of conversation with men of different pursuits and ways of looking at life, which a fortnight on ship-board presents.

Mr. Macartney and I have had opportunities of daily prayer in his cabin. We have also seen a good deal of the sailors, stokers, &c., distributing good literature; and I was able to give fifty Marked New Testaments to the stewards. (I am more and more pleased with this edition of the Scriptures, which is so eagerly welcomed and asked for.) On Sunday night the captain kindly arranged a service on the deck by moonlight, which I conducted, preaching the sermon, Mr. Macartney leading our devotions. The captain had already read the morning service in the saloon.

I have been able to do a good deal of literary work, spending about six hours a day in writing, which has helped me greatly. It helps me to feel that I am not wasting my time in these voyages if, in this way, I am still able to minister to my larger congregation. This, and reading and thinking, talking to the passengers, conversing with Mr. Macartney about our mission, and getting information about the island, have given every flying minute something to keep in store.

My heart yearns for London and my church, but I am thankful to know that Dr. Pierson is having so much blessing, and I know, also, that I am on the line of the Master's purposes.

What a shock it was when, yesterday, the Governor courteously lent me the despatches, which had come by wire to Turk's Island, and I saw the announcement of the death of my dear friend, Hugh Price Hughes. Words fail me to express my estimate of the loss we have all sustained, and indeed, the whole English-speaking world. It is only three or four months ago that we walked up together from Farringdon Street to his home; he talked with unusual eagerness and closeness about the best things—the kind of talk which one would wish for the last. He seemed to me unusually oppressed with the burdens and responsibilities of his work: and we spoke together of the co-operation of the worker with the Master Workman. The marvellous development of the mission idea in modern Methodism, the St. James' Hall work, and his share in the Million Guinea scheme, must be his noble monument; and those who knew him will never cease to love and revere his memory.

My little grandson has immensely enjoyed himself; and Mrs. Meyer and he are better. They will find two or three nice homes, whilst Mr. Macartney and I carry out, by God's help, the following itinerary:—

Kingston	till evening of	Nov. 25.
Mandeville	,,	Dec. 1.
Montego Bay	,,	,, 4.
Brown's Town	,,	,, 9.
Chapeltown	,,	,, 12.
Port Antonio	,,	,, 16.
Spanish Town	,,	,, 19.
Kingston	,,	,, 24.

We sail for home on Christmas Day.

We are now entering Kingston Harbour, amid a salvo of artillery in honour of the Governor. It is an exquisite view, which reminds me of Ceylon. Pray for us.

Kingston, November 26.

The reception which Rev. Mr. Macartney and I have received is remarkable. The Archbishop of the West Indies came to greet us on our arrival at the landing-stage, and insisted on Mrs. Meyer, our little grandson, and myself being his guests. We were also welcomed by an army of ministers of all denominations, and many Christian friends.

Our reception at night was presided over by the Archbishop, and greatly crowded. He gave a most catholic and noble welcome, showing a very just appreciation of the Keswick Convention, and expressing his earnest hope that our visit would help the cause of Christ throughout the island.

On Sunday Mr. Macartney had three services in churches, and I had four, one being in the Theatre, attended by over 2,000 persons. Wherever meetings are held they are crowded, and at night we are obliged to give our addresses twice over—first in a great Wesleyan church, then in a large Scotch church.

The most remarkable feature, so far as I have been concerned, has been in two immense audiences of men, on Monday and Tuesday, at five, and I have dealt with questions affecting young manhood. But the total impressions and conditions of those meetings require a more detailed account than I can now give.

We are now leaving for Mandeville, but a great movement is on foot here, which will (D.V.) continue until we return for concluding meetings before leaving the island.

The weather is perfect, like hot summer weather at home; we live on native fruits, and are well and thankful, amid the lovingkindness of many Christian friends.

Converted Priests in Rome.—The Home for Converted Priests in Rome, which was founded in 1899, provides a temporary refuge for men in soul-trouble—a place where the helpless and perplexed can serve God according to their conscience till suitable employment has been found for them. One of the ex-priests at the Home writes lately: "No one can possibly imagine the great good done by this institution. In order to understand something of it, it would be necessary to lift the veil and see how many hearts are sweating blood beneath the dress of the Roman Catholic priest." Warm clothing and cast-off garments will be welcome at the present season. Parcels may be sent direct to Rev. Dr. W. Burt, 38, Via Firenze, Rome (hon. secretary for the work in Italy); or they will be gladly forwarded by Miss C. M. Ward, Gottesruhe, Montalt Road, Woodford Green, Essex (hon. secretary for England).

The Missionary Association.

THE missionary enterprise is, from more than one point of view, "the greatest thing in the world." Our Lord, having glorified the Father on the earth, and finished the work which He gave Him to do, having been delivered to death for our offences and raised again for our justification, constituted as His witnesses His Apostles whom He had chosen, and with them all who had believed and who should afterwards believe in His name. They were to be His witnesses "in Jerusalem and all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Persecution scattered the members of the early Church, and they went everywhere preaching the Word, with the promised power of the Holy Ghost coming upon them, and confirming their words with signs following.

Through all the centuries from then till now the commandment of Jesus has been very haltingly obeyed, and the power of the Spirit feebly realized in comparison with what might have been. But one of the gladdest signs of our time has been and is the revived missionary zeal and the widespread endeavour to give it effect.

Including in the word "mission" every existing, and indeed, every possible agency for the proclamation of the Gospel at home and abroad, it is certain that not by human army or power, but in the power of the Holy Ghost, can this greatest thing in the world be carried on—the Gospel of the glory of the blessed God, whereby He is taking out of the nations "a people for His name."

A few Christian men and women have united themselves together under the name of "The Missionary Association," with the desire and endeavour to urge upon all Christ's Apostles the necessity, the privilege, the possibility, the command, to "be filled with the Spirit." A letter has been widely distributed to His witnesses at home and in foreign countries, setting this before them, and a large and gratifying result has been experienced, in hundreds of letters, from a few of which extracts are here given:—

Will you remember us in prayer that we three missionaries, our native assistant, and the heathen, may each, according to our separate needs, be filled with the Spirit of God?

I very heartily approve the objects of your Association. It is greatly needed. I trust it will be extensively supported, and with the blessing of the Lord Jesus it cannot fail to do much good. I have reached a great age, but I am still strong for work. I bid you God speed. I shall send you a contribution to help you on.

I rejoice that such a society as the Missionary Association is being formed at home. One learns more and more of the truth of the saying of Jesus Christ, "Without Me ye can do nothing."

If your Association will draw Christians nearer to Christ it will do a good work. I fear that Christ is very little known, even among so-called Christians. Self is the great idol; greed the passion.

I was glad to get the "Letter" of this Association, which is bound to be a great blessing. The teaching concerning the Holy Spirit cannot be too strongly emphasised in Christian work; the foreign field especially needs Spirit-filled men to stand against the powers of darkness in the midst of heathenism, and to spur them on to faithful, energetic work for our Lord.

The Association "Letter" to hand by last mail seems to me to meet a real need, and both my wife and I want to join. The need for more spiritual power and inspiration is most urgent. We here need such an outpouring of the Spirit as will arouse the dead, and for this we, and many belonging to missions through the whole of South India, are praying. The Association offers help just at the time of our great need, and we therefore welcome it with all our hearts, and wish it true "God speed."

The objects of the Missionary Association appear to me something excellent. It is just what hundreds of missionaries have been waiting for. But not speaking of others, let me say it is what I have been waiting for. Being in an out-of-the-way place, altogether isolated from any Christian communication, I shall be so thankful for any book you will be able to send me.

A few days ago your Association "Letter" came to me, and on reading its pages and noticing its objects I sincerely lifted up my heart in joyful thanksgiving and praise. God our Father will, I am sure, make it a great blessing to His labourers at home and in foreign fields. More and more am I realizing the fact that we are indeed co-workers together with God, and that He is Himself the working Superintendent of us all. Some of us at times are tempted perhaps to grow weary and disconsolate because we only look at the work in our own little corner. Such associations greatly benefit us all by leading us to lift up our eyes, and gaze on the great Master Himself, and watch Him as He moves amongst His agents all over the world. Just to see the look of assurance on His blessed face, to mark the absence of anything that looks like misgiving or regret, does us good, and makes us feel the truth of that old, old shout of triumph, "He shall be satisfied."

These responses come from north, south, east, west, and central India; from Japan, the West Indies, South Africa, Persia, Canada; and from still more distant places they will doubtless continue to come as the letters reach them. To missionaries far from home and family and friends, in jungles, in mountain stations, in islands and other lonely places, or in crowded cities, where the isolation may be not less keenly felt, it is not easy to exaggerate the relief and encouragement afforded when Christian travellers go (as Jonathan went to David in the wood) and strengthen their hands in God; or when the periodical Letter of the Missionary Association reaches them, with its assurance of brotherly and sisterly sympathy, and continual lifting up of holy hands in prayer in fellowship with them.

An Association which has immediately evoked letters of appreciation and testimony so numerous, so thankful, so hopeful, has surely come to stay, with the good hand of God upon it.

One of the developments already opened to it is the Foreign Missions Agency, of which advantage has been taken by various missions needing representation at home, to which we may have occasion to refer later. The Office of the Association is at 30, Norfolk-st., Strand.

From Dr. J. G. Paton.

LET me cordially thank the readers of The Christian for their help in maintaining the Lord's work in our New Hebrides South Sea Island Mission. We are grateful and encouraged by such help. We wish every contributor Christ's reward and enriching blessing, and plead for their prayers.

God has given us over 16,000 worshippers, and over 330 of them native teachers and evangelists, who are now helping us in the work of trying to bring the remaining population, from 40,000 to 60,000 cannibals, yet on the group, to fear and serve our dear Lord Jesus Christ.

On Malekula and its surrounding islands, the natives are almost entirely without clothing. They frequently strangle the very aged and those long sick, or bury them alive. When their female children come to be from six to twelve years of age, they knock out their two front teeth, and then sell them to the highest bidder, of from six to ten or twelve male hogs for each. The purchaser may have three or more wives already; he may be young, but is generally old. The poor girl may weep, and plead not to be sold, but she has no choice in it. Her father disposes of her at will, and under a guard armed with loaded rifles her purchaser takes her to his home. If she runs away, as is often the case, she is forced to return; if she runs away a second time, she is fetched back, and a row of three or more holes is burned in her breast or side by fiery sticks; if she runs away a third time, a hot stone is placed behind her knee, or knees, so burning her that she cannot run away again. So some are lamed for life. The buyer can sell her again, or kill her at will, and none dare find fault. She is his own. He bought her, and can do with her as he pleases. So women are slaves, and used as beasts of burden to men.

The teaching of our dear Lord Jesus is the only effectual cure for all these evils. At the three mission stations on the island of Malekula, only occupied a few years among them, there are — at Uripiv, 54 church members, and 309 attending the services; at Pangkumu, 86 church members, and 450 attending the services; and at Aulua, 100 church members, and 500 attending the services. These are doing all they can to help the missionary in bringing others to worship and serve Jesus Christ.

How it would have rejoiced our helpers in the homelands to have seen nearly 300 assembled on a recent Sabbath, when I baptized eleven adults, and dispensed the Lord's Supper to six whites and 153 of our natives sitting on the green grass, where only a few years ago I baptized the first six converts, and celebrated the first communion. Our converts form Christian villages; generally they live near each other, and begin and close every day with praise and prayer. They try to work for Jesus in teaching and preaching the Gospel to others. By grog, ammunition, and firearms given the savages, chiefly by French and other traders, many have lately been ruined and killed, and great suffering has been caused. I wish The Christian, our helpers by it, and, indeed, all your readers, and you, every success and blessing in Jesus Christ.

John G. Paton.

The Blind in North India.

FOR the work among the blind initiated by Miss Hewlett, and commenced by Miss Annie Sharp, in the compound of St. Catherine's Hospital (C.E.Z.M.), Amritsar, in the Punjab, two important needs remain.

1. The boys require a man to look after them, and the work generally needs someone of a better status and larger business capacity than can be supplied by a Christian Munshi. Medical attendance also is almost indispensable where so many feeble folk are gathered together. An English Christian gentleman and his wife would like to occupy these respective posts. She is already working among the little girls who are at Rajpur this summer, and is caring for them most satisfactorily. Some indication from the Lord to "go forward" in this matter will be regarded as an authorization to engage permanently these two workers.

2. The other need is a fellow-worker for Miss A. Sharp. The supposed technicalities of this special work need hold no one back. It is true that they should be gradually mastered by anyone hoping to be able to take full charge when necessary, but this is easily done as a pastime, while the Hindustani language is being acquired.

Communications should be addressed to Miss Annie Sharp, The Grange, Redhill, Surrey.

Brazil.

LAST advices from the field give occasion fo praise and increased prayer on behalf of this Rome-ruined, degraded land. One of our missionaries writes:—"The work here is in a most interesting and encouraging condition; indeed, there is quite a revival amongst us. Last night, at the church meeting, we had thirteen persons asking to be received into the church, most of them being the children of members. We have been praying for and expecting blessing for some time, and now the answer has come. On Sunday we have seven services, and during the week eight more, all in Recife (Pernambuco).

"The Romanists are up in arms here in dead earnest. They are holding open-air meetings on the Sundays to denounce Protestantism. We are very glad to know that our influence is so much felt as to cause such a sensation among them. It shows clearly that they are afraid of the growing power and influence of the truth. We have been asked to strike back, but this we are not inclined to do. We leave God to defend His own cause, and we shall give ourselves up to prayer." There is reason to believe that the new President of the Republic, who comes into office next month, is a bigoted Jesuit, and consequently there is likely to be trouble ahead for all Christian workers.

Dr. C. Cuthbert Hall in Calcutta.—The visit to Calcutta of Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, as holder of the Haskell Lectureship, 1902-03, has been a source of much satisfaction and profit to the missionary body and the native church in Bengal. The lectures were felt to constitute an effective contribution to the solid enlightenment of the educated classes in respect to the genius and essence of the Christian faith, and, as a consequence, to the evangelization of India's students. The Christian Literature Society is preparing the lectures for speedy publication in book form at a nominal price, and it is hoped the book will be circulated widely in all the presidencies and provincies.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, December 21. 2 Kings xvii.

HOSHEA did not follow in all the crimes of his nineteen predecessors, but the degeneracy of the nation was so advanced that nothing could arrest its inevitable punishment.

Let us read carefully the bill of divorce which their true Husband gave Israel when He put them away. It is a pathetic document (vv. 7-23), but surely none can say that Jehovah had not good cause for doing as He did. The wonder is that He bore so long with His apostate people. And we should read the three first chapters of Hosea to know how bitterly the Divine heart was rent when the hour of separation came. Nor should we forget to read the assurances, given so clearly and emphatically by the Apostle, that all the true Israel shall ultimately be saved.

The transportation of peoples from one part of their dominion to another was characteristic of the great Oriental conquerors. The Ten Tribes were removed to the mountains of Media, where there was abundant provision for a pastoral people; while races from the neighbourhood of Babylon were settled in the land of Canaan. They gave an outward formal tribute to Jehovah, as they supposed Him to be the local deity, while secretly they worshipped their own deities (29, 41). Is not this what many among us do still? They attend the outward forms of worship lest they lose caste; but in their hearts they enthrone worldly and unworthy objects of veneration.

MONDAY, December 22. 2 Kings xviii.

Hezekiah revived the traditions of David's character and reign, and carried the extirpation of idolatry further than any king that had preceded him. In full confidence in God, he even threw off the tribute with which his father, Ahaz, had purchased immunity from Assyrian inroads. Compelled by a strong party in the State, he made an alliance with Egypt, in spite of the faithful protests of Isaiah, and perhaps this was the reason why his deliverance seemed to tarry (v. 14; Isa. xxxi.).

It is interesting to know that this siege of Lachish (v. 13) is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments, and Sennacherib is depicted giving orders for its destruction. Also the names and figures of these his leading officials and captains are clearly discernible (v. 17).

What a remarkable encounter that must have been on the walls of Jerusalem, when the emissaries of the King of Babylon vented their spleen and hate in the Hebrew tongue. But from neither leader nor people was there any attempt at reply. The king had said, "Answer him not."

It was wise advice! It was best to treat the proud challenges of the foe with perfect silence, leaving God to answer them, for they had, in effect, been uttered against Him. So we are told of our Lord, that, as a sheep is dumb before her shearers, so He opened not His mouth; and we are bidden to follow in His steps, and silently commit ourselves to Him who vindicates those who are wrongfully accused. Let God vindicate thee! He will answer the proud bravado of thy foes!

TUESDAY, December 23. 2 Kings xix.

When words of blasphemous rebuke are uttered, we need to turn to God with shame and horror, because His name has been blasphemed. When we receive letters of rebuke and unkindness, whether anonymous or signed, let us treat them as Hezekiah did this insolent and blasphemous effusion; let us spread them before God, and let us plead with Him to interpose for His holy name's sake (v. 19). How blessed it is when our lot is so identified with God's that we can stand to suffer with Him—when we can forget ourselves in the one sincere desire that His character should be vindicated and His name made known. Too long and often we have striven for our own hand, our own Church, our own denomination. The selfish element has been so strong in our praying and doing. May the Spirit of God inspire us with a pure devotion to Himself; and may we become as identified with His interests, as an old servant or retainer with the interests of the family with which he has been connected from boyhood!

In all the Scripture there is nothing more eloquent than this magnificent answer to Sennacherib's challenge. The phrase "virgin daughter" referred to the fact that no foreign invader had set his foot in the holy city. Listen to her gleeful laughter, as, strong in the Lord of hosts, she derides her foes. Other nations were of small power, and as the grass for the oven, because their gods were no gods. But their God was not as they, and this controversy was not between Sennacherib and Judah, but between him and Jehovah. Hence there could be but one issue. The deadly breath of the miasma swept over the sleeping host, and they perished in a night. Child of God, thou art invulnerable, when thy cause is His!

WEDNESDAY, December 24. 2 Kings xx.

From a careful comparison of dates, it would seem that Hezekiah's illness took place during the time that Sennacherib's threats were hanging over the city. Perhaps it had been largely occasioned by anxiety. At first Isaiah declared what must be the natural issue of the illness. And here we have a remarkable instance of how prayer may operate in the spiritual realm, altering the natural course of things, as by the introduction and application of some spiritual and stronger law.

Has the shadow gone down on your dial? Has the day of your earnest devotion to God and His cause been waning lately? Have the bright promises of the morning failed of realization? Then turn to God with true repentance! Let Him see thy tears of true heart-sorrow, and He will restore the years that the canker-worm has eaten. It shall be with thee as in the days that are past. The shadow shall come backward on the dial, and thou shalt return to the days of thy youth.

How ostentatious it was of Hezekiah to show the messengers of the King of Babylon his treasures! And how foolish, for the lure of gold would be sure to excite cupidity. There is too much of the same spirit in us all; and in answer to the inquiry, "What have they seen in thy house?" we should too often have to confess that strangers have not seen our piety, our family worship, our decorous behaviour, our love one to another, but our best linen and plate, our dresses and ornaments. Alas for us, if these are our treasures, and we have not behind them the priceless jewels of character!

THURSDAY, December 25. 2 Kings xxi.

It seems incredible that the good Hezekiah should have had such a son; but the young prince was evidently educated by the reactionary party, which was only kept in check by the strong influence of Isaiah and the success of his leadership against Sennacherib. Hence, on becoming King, he re-introduced the worst forms of idolatry, which had disgraced the nations of Canaan, and were rife in the neighbouring countries. It was the height of presumptuous impiety to place a graven image, an Asherah, which was an obscene emblem, in the very precincts of the Temple, and to patronize the Chaldean astrologers who poured into the country from Babylon (see Ezek. viii.).

Vigorous protests were raised against these shameful abominations by Hosea, Joel, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Isaiah, but in vain. Nothing could stay the mad fanaticism of the people for licentious and corrupting rites, and their doom became inevitable. The gentle voice of love was of none avail, and the brazen clangour of the Babylonian captivity must sound through the streets of Jerusalem, and speak with tones that had to be obeyed. Manasseh shed innocent blood, and amongst the rest probably condemned Isaiah to be sawn in sunder (Heb. xi. 37); and Amon, his son, followed in his steps.

O souls of men, God will not be trifled with. Turn ye! turn ye! why will ye die? If you will not heed the tones that speak from the parched lips on the cross, how shall it be with you when Christ speaketh from the Throne of Judgment!

FRIDAY, December 26. 2 Kings xxii.

Another gleam of sunlight fell on the distracted land of Judah during the reign of Josiah. He began the work of reform with his accession, but in his eighteenth year set about the repair of the Temple. In this he was greatly aided by Hilkiah, the High Priest. During the process of renovation a copy of the book of the Law was discovered (v. 8), and Shaphan brought and read it to the King. It is supposed that the passage which was recited to him, and so greatly moved his soul, was Deut. xxviii.-xxx., where is given an enumeration of the terrible threats pronounced on those that failed to keep God's holy law, and of the promises to those who obeyed it.

The agitated feelings of the King led him to ask immediate counsel as to how those curses might be averted, and he sent at once a deputation to the prophetess Huldah, who was held in peculiar veneration. She had come of a noble race, and was richly endued by the Divine Spirit. We take no notice here of the allegation of the Higher Critics that this was the first time that the Book of Deuteronomy had seen the light, for the internal evidence goes strongly against such a supposition. It is enough to believe that, in the awful chaos and desolation of the religious life, copies of the Pentateuch had become very rare, so that the terrible words with which Moses proclaims the doom of idolatry were now heard for the first time in that generation.

Huldah's answer was full of gentle kindness. The punishment must befall, but it should be postponed until after Josiah had slept with his fathers. God had remarked his tenderness of heart, his humility, and his tears. How quick the Spirit of God is to notice the first signs of penitence! The tears of genuine contrition are the pearls of paradise! If any backslider shall forsake his ways and his thoughts, and return unto the Lord, his first steps will be instantly remarked and welcomed. "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran."

SATURDAY, December 27. 2 Kings xxiii.

Impressed as he had been with the recent discovery, the good Josiah felt that he must not keep it to himself, and therefore summoned a great convocation to the courts of the Lord's house, where he and his people solemnly bound themselves by the provisions of the Covenant. Then began a most drastic work of reform, and as we follow the enumeration we learn how deeply the heart of the people had become corrupted. In the Temple there were vessels for the worship of Baal and the Asherah (R.V.). There were multitudes of idolatrous priests, and houses set apart for the impure orgies of idolatry. At the Temple entrance were the horses and chariots of the sun-worship; and all around the hills in the proximity of the city were temples for the practice of idolatry. These were all swept away. Even to Samaria Josiah carried his drastic measures, and so fulfilled a prediction in which his name had been mentioned more than 300 years before (1 Kings xiii. 1-3).

But though these reforms were carried through by the King's strong hand, the generality of the people remained idolatrous and corrupt; and therefore the judgment, which had been pronounced, could not be averted (27). External reforms were not enough to secure the permanence of the national life, which was gangrened to the core.

Josiah's reign ended in terrible disaster. He persisted in measuring himself in battle against the King of Egypt, in a quarrel which was none of his; and met with his death at Megiddo, in the Plain of Esdraelon; and the mourning over him was so profound that it became proverbial of great grief (Zech. xii. 11). Thus began that series of disasters, which soon after ended in the overthrow and captivity of the whole nation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often God would have gathered thee, but thou wouldest not! From dark to darker must be thy sad course!

A Midnight Ramble.

I EXPECT you have heard your parents and friends talking lately about large numbers of men who are out of work, and who are very badly off in consequence. Some of them have been having very long holidays—not the happy sort of vacation you are looking forward to next week, but of a very different kind.

To you the words, "No work to do!" may have a very joyous sound, because they mean that you are not obliged to hurry off to school directly after breakfast, nor, if you are a boarder, to get up at an unearthly hour and scramble down hardly dressed (or, shall I say, sometimes hardly washed!) to "morning prep." But to the poor fellows of whom I write, the words, "No work to do!" become translated into "No bed to sleep in!" and "No food to eat!" either for themselves, or (in the case of those who have them) for their wives and little children.

One night, or rather morning, last week I walked eighteen miles of streets of London from 12 till 6 a.m., to see for myself something of what this means. I met scores of poor fellows—and I am sorry to say women, too—wandering dejectedly along, cold and shivering, hungry and tired. Have you ever felt during your holidays a wearisome feeling when you "don't know what to do, nor where to go," to pass away the time? It is not a pleasant feeling, is it? But the bell for dinner or tea will soon ring, or bedtime will soon come, which will, at any rate, help to pass some of the time until to-morrow. But try and think what it would mean for neither day nor night to bring relief; to start walking one mile or ten, with nothing to hope for at the end but the necessity of turning back and walking it all over again; or of sitting on a hard seat all night (if you can find one), or lying on the cold ground because you have no bed; knowing, also, that when morning comes you will have no food because you have no money.

I spoke to about thirty of those I met, one at a time, and with very little variation they all had the same sad tale to tell—how in some cases they get to the dock gates by the river as early as 4 or 5 a.m. in the hope of a job; but with hundreds of others in the same plight, it may happen that they do not get one job in a week. Failing there, they go from place to place during the day, with no better success, except for a penny or two earned here or there. Then night comes again with the same dismal, foodless, homeless prospect. Those to whom I spoke had in some cases been sleeping (or walking) out for three, seven, ten consecutive nights, or in others had been able to pay for a bed once in a week, three or four times in a month, and so on. Some were really respectable fellows, just at the beginning of their misfortunes; others were shabby and down-at-heel; others, again, hopelessly ragged or with scarcely a garment to cover them. Yet there were two things that struck me very forcibly—none of them grumbled; none of them begged; they only asked for work. I am afraid as much cannot be said of many of us who are in happier circumstances, especially as regards the grumbling! But you see we may learn useful lessons even from poor fellows like these.

I have not space here to relate the facts I learned from them of their sad lives, but how I wished I were able to create work which should enable all of them to earn enough for food and lodging. There were only three ways in which I could do anything for them, and only a very little even then. Before starting out I had provided myself with a supply of sixpences. Up till 2 a.m. (when the lodging-houses close) I could thus give a man the price of a bed, and tell him where to go if he did not know. (But most of them knew where to find one if only he had means to pay.) After two o'clock I could direct them to a Salvation Army Shelter, outside which (for it would be quite full inside) they could obtain a basin of hot soup and a piece of bread, free up till 4 a.m. After that, when neither bed nor food was available, I could only give them the sixpence for a breakfast when they could get it.

But how grateful they all were! "It ain't charity, but work as we wants, guv'nor!" many of them said, but they couldn't resist my offer of a gift when they were literally starving. It was so pathetic to see how some of those whom I may call the "twelve-till-two" men looked at their sixpence, and debated in their minds whether they should spend it (or, perhaps 4d. of it) on a bed, or wait till two o'clock for the free soup and have the sixpence for the next day's food.

I went round to the Salvation Army Shelter during the distribution of soup, and found twelve devoted workers hard at it ministering to the needs of a very pitiful crowd. Between six and seven hundred of these poor wanderers have availed themselves of this little bounty every night during the three weeks since the plan was first started. The shelter is in Stanhope Street, Drury Lane, a very poor, tumble-down quarter. The men stand patiently in a long line; each in turn enters the shelter, gets his supply, and crosses the road where a fire is burning in a movable iron stove. It was very small comfort compared with what you have in your homes; but how thankful they were, and all as quiet as mice—scarcely speaking above a whisper, lest they should wake the neighbours, because if they complained, the police would have to stop the proceedings altogether. And each man after a few minutes by the fire politely stood aside for new comers to have a warm!

Now I want each of my "boys and girls" who read this article to send me a few stamps—sixpennyworth, if you can—for the relief of such needy sufferers as I have described. You can enclose them with your BIBLE SEARCHER, and I will tell you next week how much your gifts amount to. It will be a happy and useful thing to deny yourself of some little pleasure to help in this good work for the sake of the Lord Jesus, "who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich," and who said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Christmas and Its Message to Us (Luke ii. 1-20).

CHRISTMAS is here again! With its home-gatherings, its festive joy, so that even the poorest family in our land adds something to its usual fare, and all hearts are prepared to lay aside the war of class with class, of man with man, in celebration of that Birth in Bethlehem.

First, we must contrast this spectacle with the Garden of Paradise. How great the change which has come over the scene! The first Adam started his career in full-grown manhood, the Second in the weakness of infancy; the first amid the smile of the exquisite colours and scents of a garden, the Second amid the discomfort of an Eastern khan: the first to bring the shadow of the curse on his race, the Second that He might lift us, with whom He voluntarily identified Himself, to heights of blessing and glory, which had never otherwise been attained.

Second, we must see how wonderfully outward events are under the direction of Divine Providence working out God's eternal purposes. The mother of the Lord had been residing in Nazareth; she must be brought to Bethlehem. But how? The great Roman empire is to be the intermediate means of accomplishing Micah's well-known prophecy. A decree emanates from Cæsar's place in the metropolis of the world, that all his subjects should be enrolled in every land under his sway, and this sets in motion Joseph and his betrothed wife to travel to Bethlehem, the city of David, in the second period of the governorship of Quirinus. At the precise moment, fixed in the fulness of time, Mary arrives in the little village, and He is born, whose goings were of old.

Third, we must not forget that the chosen depositaries of the Divine secrets were not the mighty, the noble, the religious leaders of the day; but simple, humble men, who kept their flocks by night. Evidently the first Christmas must have taken place in the spring, the season when shepherds in Palestine keep their flocks under the open sky by day and night. As they watch, and perhaps speak together of the great hope which was filling many hearts of the near approach of the Messiah, the heavens become irradiate with a great light, and resonant with song. God give us simple, humble hearts! Let us not aspire to be numbered among the great and renowned, if we shall thus forfeit that simplicity of spirit to which God makes known His secrets. Be lowly and childlike, believing and expectant, that God may bend over your hearts and whisper His secrets.

Fourth, notice the message which the angels brought. The Saviour is born: this is one for fear. He has come so near us that we may take Him in our arms. Shall we dread contact with one who, for love of us, is willing to stoop so very near us? This is Heaven's message, "Fear not, a Saviour is born." But there is more: remember that the greatest glory which God has is to save. It is His highest and most resplendent title that He is the Mighty Saviour.

I love to write those two clauses: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace." We should never have had peace had not Jesus brought it from heaven, and we shall never enter on its enjoyment unless we give God glory in the highest. Go through life ascribing glory to God in the highest, and you shall have peace.

Last, let us imitate the shepherds in their speedy visit to Bethlehem; their worship; and their glad announcement, bursting irrepressibly from their lips, of all that they had heard and seen. F. B. M.

Personalia.

Mr. Philip Hurditch continues in a very low state physically. The physicians can do no more; but with certain promising indications the minds of the family are stayed upon God, and their hope is in Him.

Mr. J. D. McEwen, whose missionary labours have been referred to several times of late in our columns, sails for Brazil on the 19th inst. to resume his work. On Monday last at the noon meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Mr. McEwen gave an animated address on his experiences while preaching the Gospel in the interior of the country.

After long and devoted service, Mr. Eugene Stock, under medical advice, is withdrawing from the editorial secretaryship of the Church Missionary Society. He remains one of the secretaries, but without departmental duty. The C.M.S. committee, in a minute on Mr. Stock's retirement, note that:—"By his marvellously comprehensive and interesting history of the first century of the society's life, and incidentally of the Church of England at home and abroad during that period, he has raised for himself an enduring monument, and for the missions of the future a valuable storehouse of missionary principles and experiences." Mr. Stock's successor is Rev. G. Furness Smith.

Review Lesson.

Golden Text.—Psa. xc. 1.

THROUGHOUT the whole of this period Israel resembled a wild rushing torrent, whose turbulent waters were continually prone to burst their banks, and flow out into channels of their own forming; while beneath, and on either side, the rock-bed and barriers of Jehovah's gracious purpose supported, shared, and impelled them onward toward the wide place of blessing He had prepared for them. Leaders, judges, prophets, and priest had been raised by the Lord to guide, rescue, rule, and teach. The people had often been ready to promise with the lips, but their hearts were not right towards God. "Oh, that there were such a heart in them that they should fear Me, and keep My commandments always" (Deut. v. 29). The promise of God for us is Ezek. xxxvi. 26, and the secret of wholehearted obdience, Phil. iii. 13. "Heady," "self-willed," "not afraid to speak evil of things they understand not," are signs of the last days.

Subjects.

Joshua, encouraged to succeed Moses as leader of Israel and general of the army by the promised Presence of Jehovah.

Jordan crossed. "The Lord of all the earth" caused the waters to "stand up on an heap" while Israel "passed over on dry ground."

Jericho taken by means appointed by the "Captain of the Lord's host." "I have given Jericho" Faith, Obedience, Patience, Praise.

Caleb publicly claimed Mount Hebron as his inheritance in fulfilment of the promise of Jehovah, which he had cherished for forty-five years. Acknowledged the Lord's power and blessing in enabling him to drive out the giants.

Refuge cities, six in number, appointed by the tender mercy of God for the manslayer at unawares from the avenger of blood.

Choice of religion pressed upon Israel by Joshua, supported by his own testimony. No compromise. Jehovah or idols.

Judges over Israel appointed by the Lord in seasons of dire need.

Temperance lesson. Strong drink had caused Israel to depart from the Lord, both people and priests; dimmed their glorious past, brought God's judgment on them for present and future.

Gideon, chosen, trained, strengthened by Jehovah to rescue Israel from the Philistine oppressors, 300 picked men with pitchers, torches, and rams' horns.

Ruth, the Moabitess, won to the worship of the God of Israel by Naomi. By reason of her marriage with Boaz she became the great grandmother of King David, and one link in the ancestry of the Messiah.

Samuel, page, prophet, priest, judge, the faithful, attentive, obedient servant, became ruler of Israel, priest, and prophet of the High God. A child of prayer became eminently (Jer. xv. i.) the man of prayer. The worship of God was restored, and the idols put away. "Ebenezer."

Christmas. The birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem-Ephratah. Announcement by angels. Visit of the shepherds to the Infant Saviour. "A lamb without blemish and without spot, who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in the last days to you" (I Pet. i. 19).

Characters.

Joshua. Born in slavery. A man of ordinary ability, but whole-hearted for God. Disciple and faithful servant to Moses. Called to occupy a position of grave responsibility and great difficulty. Assured of the Presence and help of Jehovah, he linked his need, by faith, to Almighty power, and surmounted every trial—except when "off guard" (Joshua ix. 14, 15, and vii. 4). A devout student of the law of the Lord. A fearless standard-bearer to rally recruits (Joshua xxiv. 15).

Caleb (Joshua's fellow). A man of soldierly courage. Strong in mind and body, whose true-hearted devotion to the Lord won for him a rich reward, and whose faith inspired him with extraordinary courage. Humble-minded, giving glory to God.

Gideon. A cautious, ingenious, capable man. Called, instructed, strengthened, and encouraged by the Lord for a special work, who lent himself unreservedly to the Master's touch and moulding for the work He had need of him to do. Gideon's father, by his confidence in his son, reflected credit on the young man's home life.

Ruth. True-hearted, gentle, affectionate, tractable, obedient and industrious. Sincere and in earnest for her adopted faith. Wise for eternity.

Eli. Humble in spirit under the judgments of the Lord. Gentle and affectionate towards Samuel; lacking in discernment towards Hannah; weak in discipline towards his sons. Good parts, good intentions, but wanting in firmness. A good and gracious life marred.

Samuel. Ranked with Moses (Jer. xv. 1). As a boy, affectionate, attentive, devoted, obedient to his aged master, Eli. An alert listener to the Voice of the Lord in youth, faithful in small duties of the Tabernacle, we read the Lord spoke to him when a man (1 Sam. ix. 15) and used him for His special messages and work (1 Sam. iii. 18; ix. 27; xii. 23; xv. 11, 16; xvi. 4.

S.S. Lesson Illustrations.

FRUIT AFTER MANY DAYS.

Dr. Lyman Beecher was once asked to preach for a country minister on a wintry Sabbath day. Snow had fallen very heavily, and the cold was so intense that when the doctor entered the pulpit, only one man was to be seen in the church. Lyman Beecher, who felt that he had a duty to perform, went through the whole of the service, addressing himself to the solitary occupant of the pews. Immediately after the benediction, the "congregation" disappeared, and the preacher was denied the privilege of speaking privately to him. Twenty years later Dr. Beecher, when travelling in Ohio, was one day approached by a stranger, who informed him that he had been the solitary listener to the sermon of days gone by. "That sermon," said he, "saved my soul, made a minister of me, and yonder is my church. The converts of that sermon," he concluded, "are to be found all over Ohio." Joshua was enjoined to be strong and of good courage; if we would work for the Lord, let us also be courageous and not neglect our opportunities with individuals. If we do our duty and turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, God will bless us in our labours for Him.—(Joshua encouraged.)

CONSECRATING OUR SUBSTANCE.

In a garden near Woking there stands a large, well-matured apple tree. For many years the rector of the parish has been in the habit of collecting the fruit, and selling it on behalf of the Church missionary societies. Locally, it is known as the missionary apple tree, and as the fruit is of the Blenheim orange variety, there is always a ready sale at good prices, and the tree has been the means of producing large sums of money in aid of God's work. When Joshua was leaving the people of Israel, he made a covenant with them on their avowal that "the Lord our God will we serve, and His voice will we obey." If we truly devote ourselves to the service of God, we shall be prepared to give our lives and our belongings to Him."—(Joshua's parting advice).

ONLY A LITTLE MOUSE.

A short time ago a Surrey town was virtually reduced to darkness because of a disastrous fire at the generating station of the electric system of the place. Much damage was done, and the catastrophe was believed to have been caused by means of a mouse. Its little charred body was afterwards discovered in such a position as to lead to such a conclusion, and the outbreak, with so small a beginning, cost the town in all some thousands of pounds. The little affairs of life need to be watched, for it is the first falsehood that leads to a career of deceit. The stealing of a trifle may be the beginning of fraudulent dealings; and "only a glass" of strong drink may mean a drunkard's grave. While we hold fast that which is good, it is essential to abstain from all appearance of evil. Abstinence is real temperance.—(Temperance Lesson).

HEARING GOD'S VOICE.

When Joan of Arc was upon her trial at Rouen, she told her accusers that at the early age of thirteen she had heard a voice from God, which came to help her in ruling herself. Heavenly voices, she said, had reached her, and she believed that her mission was to save France. Eminent for piety and purity of soul, "The Maid" gained admittance to the Dauphin, because of the faith that was in her. Believing that God had appointed her to rescue her country, Joan was able to rally the troops to her white banner, and emboldened by her trust in God, she led the nation from victory to victory. Just as the Lord spoke to Samuel and appointed him a work, He has a message for all who will listen to His voice. To every willing heart a sphere of usefulness is open; may we each have the grace to hear and to answer "Here am I, send me."—(The Boy Samuel.)

"In School and Playground."—Rev. J. H. Jowett (Birmingham) describes this book as "written in a way which will attract and fasten the attention of the young people." The secretary of the Belfast Y.M.C.A. (Mr. D. A. Black) says, "I have read it with the greatest possible pleasure. Its first chapter led me on until I found I had completed the entire book without break. It is exceedingly suggestive." (1s., 2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)

HOLYHEAD.

"THE meeting held on Dec. 5 at Holyhead, by Rev. Dr. Henry and Mr. T. Armon Jones, was presided over (writes a correspondent) by Mr. H. Lewis, J.P., ex-mayor of Bangor. The hall was filled, and Dr. Henry spoke with eloquence and force on 'The Temperance Teaching of the Bible.' His address undoubtedly gave a moral and spiritual uplift to the Temperance cause in the town. He convinced us that in the Old Book we have an impregnable rock of Temperance teaching. Mr. Armon Jones, one of Wales' powerful singers, was warmly welcomed. The combined powers of these two brethren must surely create a deep impression throughout the land."

WORCESTER.

The meetings at Worcester, to which reference was made in our last issue, grew in numbers and enthusiasm. Night after night the Public Hall has been filled by sympathetic audiences. There have been some noteworthy cases of pledge signing, and it is hoped that as the outcome of meetings with the clergy and ministers there may come the formation of a United Temperance League. One of the most striking of the addresses was that on "The Industrial Aspect of the Drink Question," in which the speaker contrasted the United States with Great Britain from a temperance point of view, pointing out that the reason why the United States gains ground on this country is because only half as much liquor is consumed there. In America forty-nine great railway companies, employing two millions of people, insist that every man shall be an abstainer. Seventy-five per cent. of the skilled mechanics abstain. By way of contrast, Dr. Henry pointed out, among other facts, that the working classes of England spent last year alone in strong drink sufficient money to give every man and woman in the kingdom, over sixty years of age, a weekly pension of twenty-seven shillings.

Describing the meetings on Lord's Day last, a correspondent writes:—In the afternoon the Public Hall was packed with men, while the Workman Hall was filled with women. In the evening the Public Hall was densely crowded, many standing throughout the entire service. In the men's meeting Dr. Henry spoke with much force and feeling on the responsibilities of Christians to unite and work for the solution of the drink problem. The meeting was composed largely of working men. The interest was almost painfully rapt, as the delineation of Christ-like service proceeded, and as the evil influences of the drink traffic were depicted. The vast audience glowed with indignation, and seemed resolutely bent on remedying the present condition of things in this cathedral city. The evening meeting was representative of the best elements in the city; both speaker and singer were at their best, and the impression was extraordinary. No such temperance meetings, it is believed, have been held in the city. The mission has made great strides in interest and power, and is likely to result in important improvements in temperance organization in Worcester."

A Course of Illustrated Missionary Lectures has been arranged for the school-girls of Edinburgh by members of the local women's branch of the British College Christian Union. One is held in St. Cuthbert's Hall each month during this winter in order to bring before the girls statements of recent religious progress and social development in other countries. Two lectures have already been given. The next is to be on January 16, when Rev. Wm. Campbell will speak on "Daybreak in Far Formosa." H. R. V.

About Books.

DR. JAMES MARTINEAU.

TO those who have followed religious speculation and philosophical thought during the past generation the Life and Letters of James Martineau will have a strong attraction. Not that the man and his work present a cogent and impressive message for the enlightenment and consolation of men and women bowed under a sense of sin and seeking the favour of God. Rather they may be regarded as a mental stimulant and a logical gymnastic; and while calculated to engage the close attention of metaphysicians, they will serve a useful purpose in the hands of those who would see how the wise in this world feel after God, and how those who have loosed the moorings of a simple faith in Christ are straitened in order to reach a conclusion on the ever-urgent question of authority in religion.

That Dr. Martineau was a great man is unquestioned; as a thinker he was gigantic, as a writer he wielded a mighty power. The story of his life discloses a character that cannot but command admiration; inspired by noble ideals, he combined fidelity to conviction with a very beautiful spirit. By inheritance and the influences of early training, Christian graces were wrought into his being; hence when, in his mental system, the Scriptures were superseded by philosophy, and Christ was looked upon as a negligeable quantity in religion, he still remained a singularly attractive personality when judged by high ethical standards.

Though the biographical pages are full of interest, they have hardly the value of the letters that are so faithfully reproduced in these volumes. The story of the insistent worker, who for forty-five years served the cause of education and the pursuit of learning in connection with Manchester College, has its obvious lessons. The book itself must unfold the trials of its subject, and tell the story of his associations with his sister, Harriet Martineau, and his friend of many years, F. W. Newman. There, too, the reader will trace the evolution of thought, ever further from Evangelical conceptions, until Conscience took the place of Christ, and religion became a superfine morality. As honours were showered upon the man, in due recognition of his fame, so there came to him from certain quarters encouragement to plan a "Free Christian Church," in which Trinitarians and Unitarians could be embraced, also to attempt the compilation of a "Book of Common Prayer," for all sorts and conditions of people, however dogmatically distinguished.

We have marked many passages of special interest; but must content ourselves to reproduce one. In a letter to a correspondent, towards the end of his life (he died in 1900), he wrote:—

> For myself I own that the literature to which I turn for the nurture and inspiration of Faith, Hope, and Love, is almost exclusively the product of orthodox versions of the Christian religion. The hymns of the Wesleys, the prayers of the Friends, the meditations of Law and Tauler, have a quickening and elevating power which I very rarely feel in the books on our own Unitarian shelves.

Surely the admission is significant. When over ninety years of age, the keen controversialist admits that he finds comfort, not at the point he has reached, but at that from which he started in his confident course! About half the second volume is devoted to a survey of Dr. Martineau's philosophical work, by Professor Upton. There are several striking portraits representing various ages of life.

Mrs. Gorges gives us, year by year, helpful messages suggested by the season. We welcome the booklet Hitherto, in which beautiful words are set in a tasteful design (4d. Walter Wheeler, 17, Paternoster Row, E.C.), also, To Greet You, with poem, "My Peace I Give Unto You" (3d.), and A Truly Happy Christmas Day, with verses, "I, Jesus . . . the Bright and Morning Star"; and Best Wishes with words, "He will not fail thee" (both 2d. each. Caswell, Birmingham).

The Fairchild Family, by Mrs. Sherwood, is an old friend, and it is a great pleasure to greet it in such an attractive form as now issued by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., with an introduction by Mary E. Palgrave, and illustrations by Florence M. Rudland. (6s.) Needless to say, the tale is full of juvenile interest, and will be read again and again by the little folk. The historical particulars given in the introduction are very welcome, and will, it is hoped, do something to attract new readers to the pages. The engravings are very numerous, and of a high order. Binding and all else mark this as a capital presentation volume.

Life and Letters of James Martineau. By James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Litt. D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford; and C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc. Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College, Oxford. (Two vols., 30s. nett. Nisbet & Co.)

Yeshudas: A Monograph. A strange brief eerie story of the unfathomed ways by which the Spirit of love and grace fulfils the words of Yeshu (Jesus)—"All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me." It is told in a series of word-pictures of Indian modes of life and thought, by Annie H. Small, and dedicated to the loved memory of her Father, John Small, of Poona, who for thirty-five years gladly lived his life in the service of the people of India, whom he held in honour. Principal Rainy, D.D., supplies a prefatory note. (Edinburgh: Macniven and Wallace.)

The usefulness of wall-text cards as preachers of the Gospel is fully recognised, and improvements in their manufacture during recent years have made them most attractive decorations for many purposes. Among the most beautiful we have seen are those published by Messrs. Kauffmann (5, and 6, Paternoster Square, E.C.), who have introduced for the present season a number of fresh features in design and ornament. At every price from 1d. to 1s. a large variety can be obtained, the texts being well chosen and adapted for use in sitting-room, bedroom, mission-hall, &c. Several series with hymn-verses will be special favourites among children.

The high praise which we were able to bestow on Nave's Index-Digest of the Holy Scriptures on its first publication in this country, has been more than justified by the high place which the book has won for itself in the regard of those who have used it. The preparation of an edition on Oxford India paper adapts it for use in circumstances under which the white paper copies are found too large or heavy. The type is excellent, and the classification of Scripture passages makes this a useful tool for those whose privilege it is in any way to minister the Word of God. The printing of all out at length under suitable headings does more than supersede even the use of a reference Bible. No turning from page to page can give the same facility for study and exposition as having the whole teaching on a subject set out at one opening. (17s. upwards. Henry Frowde.)

The "Fireside" Pictorial Annual abounds with readings, papers, stories, and poems, carefully selected with a view to general reading in the family circle. The variety of the topics is almost endless, and its educational as well as entertaining value will win for the volume many friends. The poetry has been contributed from many popular quarters, and the illustrations combine with all the other features to constitute a handsome and attractive gift book. (7s. 6d.) The Day of Days' Annual exhibits all the excellent features of The Fireside within smaller compass. For young people it may be highly recommended. (2s.) The "Hand and Heart" Illustrated Tales have proved their popularity in the monthly form, and readers will find in the volume nine wholesome tales, each bringing home a good moral. (2s. "Home Words" Publishing Office, 14, Ludgate Square, E.C.)

The Baptist Almanack and Directory, 1903, gives lists of ministers, congregations, &c., up to date, and contains three excellent portraits. (2d. R. Banks & Son.)

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and heavers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Rev. Jesse Mayo at Eston, Middlesbrough.

THE mission conducted by Rev. Jesse Mayo at Eston, Middlesbrough, grew in power and interest as the days went by, "until," writes Mr. Wilkin, the secretary, "upwards of a hundred workers paraded the streets, in spite of the damp and cold—a thing which has not been seen for years in this place. Very many have expressed their thankfulness to God for the visit, having received fresh inspiration from the addresses, so faithfully delivered. It was a pity that the missioner was obliged to proceed elsewhere just when the people were moved to definite service; but since he left others have swelled the numbers of those who have given themselves to God."

Hope Hall, Paisley.

Paisley has had a visit from Mr. J. A. Smith, superintendent of the Gordon Evangelistic Mission, Aberdeen, who has just concluded a mission in Hope Hall. The mission extended from Sabbath, November 23, to Sabbath, December 7 inclusive. The meetings were well attended, numbers heard the Word, and not a few believed unto life eternal.

The town is famed for its thread industry, and for the huge dividends derived from its thread; but it has another fame that newspapers and financial journals take no note of—it has several all-alive centres of Gospel work, where the salvation of men is continually sought, and Hope Hall is not the least among them. Mr. Smith's ministry in Hope Hall has been acceptable and helpful to many, based, as his ministry always is, on the Word of the Lord, which endureth for ever. J. C.

Mr. W. Collard at Guildford.

Mr. William Collard has during the past fortnight been holding evangelistic meetings at the Stoughton Mission room, a building connected with the Guildford Congregational Church, and his efforts have been greatly owned of God. The mission is not large, but the meetings were well attended, the people listening with great attention to the addresses, illustrated with narratives from Mr. Collard's wide and varied experiences. At the close of each service some have come to a definite decision, signing a card to the effect that they would take the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour. Several of the elder lads were among those who signed cards, and have since testified by a changed life. Mr. Collard spent part of each day, as usual, in visiting the people in their homes, thus interesting many in the meetings. We feel grateful to God for sending His servant to this part of His vineyard. C. M.

Messrs. Olney and Johnson at Wood Green.

Monday night (December 8) brought to a close a fruitful ten days' mission in the Baptist Church, Finsbury Road, Wood Green, N. The hearts of Pastor W. Winston Haines and his ready helpers have been filled with thankfulness to God for manifest blessing upon the devoted labours of Mr. William Olney, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, who preached, and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson, who ministered in song. There were three services held on each of the two Sundays, the afternoons being specially set apart for young people. The intervening period was marked by signs of growing interest in the meetings held nightly, first for children, then for adults. With great plainness of speech, abundant illustration from life, and evident love for souls, the preacher made a deep impression upon those who could not be other than attentive listeners. Mr. Johnson, once an American actor, has forsaken the frivolities of the stage to sing about the realities of eternity; and the simple words of faith and love that he sometimes weds to familiar melodies, while accompanying himself on the zither, were well taken up by the children. It was very touching to hear him read some of their letters. Bible-readings on three of the weekday afternoons were found to be very helpful to believers. Undoubtedly the missioners found much favour with God and with man; and a large number of people, young and old, have professed decision for Christ, as the result of a mission wherein great grace was upon them all. B.

Gipsy Smith's mission at Derby, which concluded on December 15, was a glorious time of ingathering. The evangelist writes: "There were great crowds and much blessing."

Mr. Charles Inglis in America.

Few evangelists are better known on this great continent, and their work more highly appreciated, than is Mr. Charles Inglis. Of the many visits he has paid to our country, perhaps none of them have proved more fruitful in blessing than the present series he is holding in our great cities.

During the last six weeks he has been preaching in various churches in different parts of the country, and the interest in some places has been so great that on one Sunday he addressed five large crowds. Large numbers have professed to have received blessing, and a great deal of interest is being awakened in the various cities that he has promised to visit.

He is greatly interested in the meetings he is holding among convicts. In one of the large penitentiaries recently, nearly 1,100 assembled to hear his address; more than seventy of the men were murderers. Many among the audience were broken down, and the Spirit of God evidently was working in many of these sad hearts. During the next three months he expects to preach three times on Sunday and twice each week day at Northfield, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, and New York.

Mr. Inglis gave a course of Bible lectures to business men in New York City at the Old Fulton Street noon meeting, a place hallowed with the most sacred memories, and where Christian people of all denominations have been gathering since 1857 for prayer each day. It is a spot that is dear to the hearts of many, for the great revival of 1858 and 1859 which swept over this continent began in this place. Renewed interest is now manifest, and from this centre there radiates a strong influence that is felt throughout the entire country.

Readers of The Christian will be glad to know that there is a great spirit of expectation among many of the Lord's people, and perhaps not for years has there been such a desire on the part of the people to gather into the churches and listen to the Gospel. From the Atlantic to the Pacific reports come in of many souls being won for Christ, and believers here will greatly appreciate the prayers of English Christians for a mighty work of grace during this coming winter.

New York. F. H. Jacobs.

In a happy, fruitful fortnight's mission, just concluded at Oak Hall, Upper Caterham, Mr. Thos. Payne, of Manchester, worked hard and prayerfully. God has encouraged both him and all interested by using this event to draw Christians closer together in the bonds of brotherly love, and also by bringing a goodly number of the unconverted, both old and young, to Himself. To God we ascribe all the glory.

E. E. Pickard.

The services conducted by Mr. Leonard Weaver at Barnsbury Chapel, N., on Sunday last were inspiriting, and in the evening the building was crowded. Mr. Weaver's appeals were blessed of God; there were several decisions for Christ. The choral part of the service was led by Mr. Beaton, and the North London Christian Singers' Union. The hearts o Christians were stirred at the manifest evidence o blessing. J. H.

A six days' mission has been conducted at Newton Heath, Manchester, by Mr. H. Thorne. The meetings were held in connection with the P.S.A. Society and the Primitive Methodist Church. Great interest was aroused, and good was done. A number decided for Christ. There was a specially large attendance at the lecture on "From the Stage to the Pulpit." Many young people confessed to the help it gave them in its revelation of the character of theatres and plays. A great number acknowledge the blessing they have received. T. P.

Mr. Thorne also held a twelve days' mission in connection with the P.S.A. at Trinity Wesleyan Chapel, Waterloo Street, Oldham. The services were well attended, and heartily appreciated.

A mission has just been conducted at Shefford, Beds, by Rev. John Mitchell. The meetings were made very attractive both to young and old by his original object – addresses from mechanical diagrams. The earnest Gospel appeals of the preacher and the simplicity of the message proved a stimulus to the church, and the result was much blessing. Mr. Mitchell and the pastor (Rev. F. E. Hall) sang solos during the evening, and, notwithstanding inclement weather, the interest was well maintained. H.

Mrs. Woodcock, of Sheffield, has held a ten days' mission at the Gospel Union Hall, Northwich, which has been attended by spiritual quickening, and by sinners being led to decision. At one meeting, in particular, believers received much stimulus, and as a result Christians who had failed in prayer and testimony are labouring for the Lord with boldness. Pipes and tobacco have been put on the fire, and football matches forsaken. The Hall became quite inadequate for the number of people wishing to attend, and the open-air services were so large that we were requested to refrain from holding them in the vicinity of the Hall. The work is continuing, and sinners are coming to the Saviour. God be praised for this gracious quickening. Thos. Makepeace, Pastor.

Dr. Torrey's Visit. Assurances come to hand from many quarters that a cordial reception will be extended to Dr. Torrey and Mr. Charles Alexander. The number is growing of those who are waiting upon God for a rich blessing in connection with the effort, and workers of experience are making arrangements so that they may as far as possible take full advantage of the opportunity afforded for special service. We have received additional interesting notes of the mission in India, which we must defer to our next issue.

Christmas. We wish our readers in the best sense a merry Christmas, and the best wish we can express for the world at large is that the message of Christmas may be received by all. We are far from that yet. The world has neither peace with God nor peace with itself. It is unhappy and quarrelsome because it has abandoned God, and by a law which rules all things it is wrong in the details because it is wrong at the centre. A Society paper declares that Christmas is really become unwelcome to a large class amongst the upper ten, on account of the customary "goodwill" it is expected to exhibit, and which its selfishness rebels against. This is probably a little too caustic. But there is no doubt that for a vast number Christmas is entirely divorced from the Christ, and the festival is degraded to a Bacchanalian banquet. The better middle classes make it the season for family reunions, and for tasting the best there is in family life. Above all things, however, we need that it should be, what it ought to be, Christian. "Emmanuel, God with us;" "Glory to God . . . goodwill to men." At Christmas, as at all other times, God must stand first.

If Christ Had Not Been Born. The great event which we commemorate at Christmastide is so intimately interwoven with our thoughts and lives that it is often difficult to realize its deepest significance. Only when we try to imagine a world without Christ, and the awful blank that would follow, do the riches of the "unspeakable gift" of God come home to us. If the angel song had never trembled under the starry night, if the cradle, the cross, the empty grave had never held the Saviour, if the message of pardon, and grace, and immortality had never been spoken to mankind, what would now be the condition of the world? "Without hope, and without God." We should be looking up "from a dead earth to a soulless heaven." There would be no answer to the cry of the world for light, and help, and salvation. As it is, these priceless gifts are ours, and have so become a part of us that they are in danger of being ranked among the commonplaces. Therefore, on these days of Advent it is our duty to "think on these things," and to open our hearts to the ineffable story of the wonderful love of God in sending His Son into the world.

"Goodwill to Men." Christmas, if it is to be a reality, is to be a time, not of empty wishes, but of active goodwill. Those who shut themselves up within the charmed circle of home, without any thought of the many homeless ones, whose social loneliness is emphasized by inclemencies of weather and disabilities of poverty, are guilty of gross selfishness. Our kindness should be discriminating, but it should always be effectual. It should not fail because many attempts will be made to divert it into unworthy channels. It is worth while taking trouble to find out the deserving case, and the extent of the trouble we are willing to take, in order to be truly and wisely kind, is a measure of our love to Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me." The "Merry Christmas" which is enjoyed in oblivion of the woes and needs of the world will not be truly "merry," and it will be unsanctified—and therefore barren of true joy. "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Need—and Succour. The French Academy, thanks to the munificence of a patron a century ago, makes a distribution every year of "prizes of virtue" for outstanding cases of beneficence and self-forgetful service. M. Henri Houssaye, in delivering the recent inaugural address, said that while the study of the cases brought before him had taught him the inexhaustible good done by kindly people in relieving suffering, it had also taught him how appalling is the mass of suffering that still remains to be relieved. This is the impression left on the minds of all philanthropists. In this as in the still darker trouble of sin, the "harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few." There is more to be done than can be undertaken by the small number who are moved to sympathy and helpfulness. The great crowd hurries along intent on self; the few only are touched with the spirit of human infirmity sufficiently to do something practical. But these are the friends, the fellow-workers to whom Christ shall say at last, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

The Nation and the Unemployed. The resolution of the London County Council with regard to the unemployed, to which we referred a fortnight ago, was immensely strengthened at the last meeting of the Council by a decision to approach the Government, in conjunction with public bodies all over the kingdom, with a view to making the question of the unemployed a national, rather than a municipal one. Certain phases of the question can only be dealt with effectively from the centre, inasmuch as Crown lands are likely to be used in the working of any scheme for employing men. Our only fear is lest the scheme should be bound with red tape and dragged on with the slowness to which we have been accustomed in other measures. Things have become acute—the distress in London alone is terrible, and the outlook for the winter is very black. Here is a matter for urgency.

A Great Temperance Reform. It will be well for the public to realise that on January 1 a new Licensing Law comes into force in this country which in many ways initiates a social revolution in England. Hitherto, no one could interfere with a drunken person unless he were disorderly as well, or was in charge of any carriage, horse, cattle, or steam engine. In future, if a person is found drunk in any highway or public place, whether a building or not, or on any licensed premises, he may be apprehended and punished. Those convicted as habitual drunkards must not within three years of their conviction purchase or obtain liquors on any licensed premises, and publicans who supply them are liable to a heavy fine, and any friend who encourages a drunken person to go on drinking comes under a legal penalty. There are other drastic changes in the licensing laws, which are in future to be administered in February instead of the autumn, and clubs come in for vigilant oversight and reform. Temperance workers should make it their business to study this Act well, and see that it is loyally put into effect in their own localities.

A Model Liquor Law. All eyes are just now directed towards South Africa, where the perplexing processes of pacification and reconciliation are being fronted by the authorities, and the laws of the new colonies as they are being formulated are naturally carefully scrutinized. As regards the Liquor Law recently published by Lord Milner, it must be gladly acknowledged that it could scarcely be improved. No natives are to be supplied with liquor, under heavy penalties, and no licences granted to such as have been convicted of doing so; barmaids are abolished; children under sixteen cannot be supplied; there is to be Sunday closing, also on Good Friday and Christmas Day and on Parliamentary and municipal elections during polling time; no wages are to be paid on licensed premises. And there is to be a real chance of local veto of a majority of the citizens in any ward, village, and municipality. In reading all this, we are tempted to cry, O that it were so in the homeland!

West-End Temptations. The City of Westminster Watch Committee, of which Mr. H. L. d'Arcy Jaxone is chairman, is facing the condition of the streets in that area in a wise and business-like spirit. The recent deputation to the Home Secretary, if it did not meet with the encouragement it had hoped for, was an evidence of the Committee's seriousness of purpose to ameliorate the moral condition of certain leading thoroughfares. It is high time the law was made more stringent, but meantime the police authorities should be required to act upon the powers the law already confers upon them.

The Cause of Purity. Those who have the moral well-being of our people at heart will find in The Shield, the official organ of the British Committee of the Federation for the Abolition of State Regulation of Vice, very valuable information upon this subject. In the December issue Mrs. Josephine Butler states the need of such work with deep feeling when she says:

Can we remember the tens of thousands of women, young girls, even children, who are being ruined, corrupted, slain in body and soul, in fortresses all over the world, without sorrow, without suffering? I think few women, few fathers, can escape such sorrow if they cherish the memory of those who are in bonds; but it is well to share in any way the sacred sorrow of the Saviour of the lost, and such sorrow is fruitful.

We are thankful to note that the subject is being seriously considered by the Cape Parliament, as well as by the authorities in Continental countries.

Life in High Places. One of the incidental things in a recent cause célèbre has been the compulsory lifting of the veil that conceals from the democracy the kind of life which appears to be common amongst a section of the rich and leisured classes. That it is not the only view possible, we are profoundly thankful to admit. Some of the finest work being done to-day, both in religious and social circles, is in the hands of members of the "upper ten," who are the salt of their own society. But the other spectacle is saddening and sickening. To such life would appear to be a round of pleasure, with scarcely a redemptive moment of honest work. Some of them are parvenus made by money alone, and life for them is a squandering of money upon all sorts of gaiety. Yet they attend church occasionally! Surely their clergy have a veritable missionary work to do amongst this class, which is practically destitute of the idea of responsibility, according to its own admissions.

The Marriage Relation. Recent revelations have made it clear how lightly the marriage tie is regarded by an apparently growing number of people. Needless to say, they are not people who own allegiance to the law of God. The sharp stinging question put by Mr. Lawson Walton, K.C., to one witness, "You did not think at all of the Divine law?" went at once to the heart of the matter. There is nothing Divine about marriage in the estimation of these people—the contract may be dissolved at will. There can be no question that these loose ideas are spreading. It will be an evil day for this country if some of the "reforms" suggested come into operation. When the bond of the family disappears, society will soon dissolve. Christian pulpits need to send out a certain sound concerning these things, and above all, our youths and maidens should be led to understand that marriage is no experiment, no pleasantry, but an association of man with God in the solemn work of propagating the race. If people would pray about their life-partners, they and we should be spared the tragedies which daily come to light.

The Growth of Native Races. The rapid increase of the indigenous African races under British rule (the Zulus, for instance, having more than doubled in a quarter of a century, and the Basutos having quadrupled in the same time) affords theme for serious thought. In the light of this outlook, the question of the treatment of these and their neighbouring races assumes an almost terrible interest, and it cannot now be shelved, or inefficiently dealt with, without the deeper wrong of adding to the racial antipathies which our descendants also will have to grapple with. Any and all attempts to elevate these peoples without the everlasting foundation of the Gospel of Christ, must necessarily fail, and it is for the Christian Church to-day to emphasize this in every possible way, especially by the practical development of missionary work.

Peace on Earth. The authoritative statements as to the better feeling between England and France, and to the probability of an early and satisfactory termination of the negotiations for a peaceful solution of all outstanding points of difference, certainly are very gratifying. It is far from creditable to our common Christianity that twenty centuries after the birth of the Divine Prince of Peace our country and the Continent should be bristling with bayonets; and especially at this time of the year every Christian will pray for the development of goodwill among men. A great movement, to which sufficient publicity has not yet been given, is now on foot to bring about peaceful relations with France, and many Chambers of Commerce and, what perhaps is better, the great trades unions and co-operative associations, representing millions of the operative classes, have already thrown their weight into it. It is upon these latter that the brunt of war falls, and it is for them to speak out. No Government can afford persistently to ignore righteous public opinion, or to go beyond it.

Surrender Made Easy. Mr. Moody, in preaching the Gospel, did not tell his hearers that they must surrender themselves to God; but induced them to surrender by evidently setting forth before their eyes Jesus Christ crucified and risen. His little son one day got hold of some dangerous thing which it was necessary for him to surrender. The father did not demand it, much less attempt to take it by force. He held up some attractive object which he knew the child would desire; and the evil thing was at once yielded up, and the good thing accepted.

Full Surrender Made More Easy. But the Apostle, who was the Evangelist's teacher, does not make a demand, does not say "you must," but exclaims, "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God," which in previous expositions He has evidently set forth before them.

I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God—who hath shut Jews and Gentiles all up together in unbelief, that he may have mercy upon all—that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, your reasonable worship. And be not conformed to this age, but be transfigured by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what that holy, acceptable, and perfect will of the Lord is.

Transfiguration. As your Lord, when in the flesh, presented his body to be transfigured, and those who were with Him on the Holy Mount were eye-witnesses of His majesty, so present your bodies to be transfigured, that you may prove to God and to yourselves, to angels, to demons, and to men, what is the holy, acceptable, and perfect will of the only wise God your Saviour. "Ye see your calling, brethren." "I, Paul, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye are called." The Gospel of God, from its first reception by the sinner to its consummation in eternal glory, is not "Thou shalt," but "I will," not "Do," but "Be." "Be born again," "Be transfigured." These are not in your own power. But things impossible with men are possible with God. "Lo I come to do Thy will, O God."

Christmas and its Memories.

"UNTO us a Child is born." The Father's Holy Child, Immanuel, God with us. A virgin birth, no mere human generation, however exalted, but the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. Result of eternal purpose, and known in the overshadowing of the Holy Ghost. Pure and eternal life in casket of sinless body, prepared of God and fitted for the Divine nature. Fairer than the children of men. Heaven's beauty, bounty, and blessing.

Welcome, indeed, Thou Son of God's love, harbinger of grace and truth, earnest and pledge of redemption. Surely there is room for Thee now. If renewed hearts are sought for Thy dwelling, then in a very real sense there is no need of room for Thee in the inn. The caravanserai, the manger, the rejoicing mother, and the Holy Child Jesus are grateful memories. Faith hath received Thee into the innermost of each believer, and Thou art enshrined, not at Bethlehem, but in Thy purchased earthly temples, soon to be glorified and fashioned according to the body of Thy glory.

Do the sons of men tell of, and prepare for, Christmas joys and friendships? Even with surpassing intention and meaning, do we come to the Great Father's house and table to find welcome, and that table laden with the spoils of His salvation. How welcome the sacred voice of the Almighty Host, "Eat and drink abundantly, O beloved, and let your souls delight themselves in fatness." Surely the fruits of the great salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ refresh and strengthen us. In participation of His triumphs, we pass into partnership with the Divine nature, and forget that we are the sons of men, through His power and right who hath made us sons of God.

O blessed birth of Him, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Yes, He has come; chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. Hear ye not the swelling music? "Behold, we bring you glad tidings of great joy." Saviour, Redeemer, and Eternal Life, how fair Thou art. This sober truth we tell. "We are ravished with Thy love." Strains of heaven's melody give the feast of sanctified intelligence and overflow of renewed heart and soul, for truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ.

Prolific Christmas to the believer. No pagan feast is here, or base appeal to voluptuous passion and midnight revelry. Ring out the false, ring in the true. Open out thy choicest stores, O birth of the Holy Child Jesus, to the sons of men. Christ's coming the pledge and proof of God's great love to man. The Son given, the government to be upon His shoulder; and His name, "the Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Ten thousand welcomes, Thou beloved Lord. Loved, redeemed, forgiven, accepted, possessed of eternal life, made to share His resurrection life and glorified in Him! Surely Christ's birth is laden with weightiest cause for loudest thanksgiving, gratitude, and the voice of united melody.

Christmas Poems.

CHRISTMAS MORNING.

A little babe had seen the earthly light,
A sinless babe, with pure eyes clear and bright:
A mother's heart was full of holy joy
As she looked down upon her Holy Boy,
On that first Christmas morn.

A prophecy of bygone days and years,
That told amid the world's dark doubt and fears
Of that fair day, was then and there fulfilled,
And by an Infant's cry all heaven was thrilled,
On that first Christmas morn.

A song awoke among the angel band,
An echo reached our far-off sin-cursed land:
A whisper floated through the shades of hell,
As from its tyrant lord the sceptre fell,
On that first Christmas morn.

I sing to-day the song they sang of old,
As in my ears once more the tale is told
Of Jesus and His love, and swell again
The praises of the Babe in heavenly strain,
On this blest Christmas morn.

I see to-day what Mary never saw,
The perfect Man who kept God's perfect law;
I see the vast results of that blest life,
And fight a vanquished foe in earth's long strife,
Of this glad Christmas morn.

And may I tell that story, old but new,
That unmatched story, reader, unto you?
That Jesus lived and died, that you and I
Might live to-day a life that cannot die,
On this blest Christmas morn!

Dost thou believe? Is Jesus unto you
All that His name implies? Then is it true
He saves you from all sin; and in His name,
I wish you every blessing faith can claim,
On this new Christmas morn.

William Luff.

GOD WITH US.

It never ceases through the changeful ages,
The echo of the angels' heavenly song;
Its constant music ever grief assuages,
And every season doth its joy prolong.

But at this Christmastide we pause to listen
As ne'er beside throughout the busy year;
We look intently to the skies which glisten,
And raise our ears to catch those notes of cheer.

The gladsome tale is told by countless voices
That Christ the Lord, the Saviour kind, is born;
"Fear not!" we hear anew, and earth rejoices
At the good tidings brought to hearts forlorn.

Hark! "Unto God on high be highest glory,
Peace on the earth so marred by sin and strife,
Goodwill to fallen men"—oh, blessed story!
Hope springs unmeasured through that wondrous life.

God by His Son hath now most surely spoken,
Sent Him a Father's faithfulness to prove—
Sent Him to bless us and to be the token
Of His unmerited but boundless love.

Shall we not listen—ay, and sing with gladness?
God is with us—"God manifest in flesh"—
Born to redeem us from our sin and sadness—
Learn we to-day the angels' song afresh.

TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY.

Rejoice, O earth, break forth and sing,
To you is born a Saviour King,
Light of the world divine!
In mortal flesh your God behold,
By Jewish seers so long foretold;
And worship at His shrine.

Great is the myst'ry, truly grand;
God stretches forth a helping hand,
"Arm of the Lord revealed"!
The Father gave the Son to save,
Redeeming mortals from the grave,
And by His stripes we're healed.

Made sin for us, this sinless Son,
Met well its claims, and vict'ry won,
Thus honouring the law;
In Him we die, in Him we rise,
Ourselves a living sacrifice—
In Him to die no more.

Break forth, O earth, rejoice and sing,
Hail heaven's anointed Lord and King!
He comes with power divine
To scatter foes, establish right,
Diffusing wisdom, love, and light,
For evermore to shine.

C. M. Handley.

THE PROMISED GIFT.

God's promises had ripened,
Through ages of delay;
To Bethlehem Ephratah
The Babe Christ came to-day.

All heaven bent down to listen,
As earth's first advent hymn
Awoke the midnight silence,
From choir of seraphim.

Filled with sublimest pity
For infinite array
Of human sin and sorrow,
The Man Christ came to-day.

From highest heights descending,
Grief's lowest depths He trod;
And bearing love's sweet message,
Became incarnate God.

Once more He comes in triumph,
Then earth shall own His sway;
And every lip acknowledge
The King Christ born to-day.

E. M. Richardson.

THE STAR ABIDING.

How the shining of yon star
Sings its great Creator's praise,
To the myriad worlds afar
Flashing forth its clear bright rays.

Satellites around it roll,
Where, perchance, some living race,
Born—like us—with heart and soul,
Learn God's handiwork to trace.

Lenses, prisms, formed with skill,
Taught us those vast worlds to know;
Wondrous scenes our vision fill
Till our minds with rapture glow.

God in heaven is like that star
To the myriad minds of men,
Shining on us from afar,
Glorious beyond human ken

Now He comes in us to dwell,
With His Holy Spirit's seal,
That His praises we may tell,
And His work of grace reveal.

Christian lives He moulds, to bear
Witness to our God on high—
Lenses that may bring Him near
His great love to magnify.

Jesu! Lord, my soul inspire,
Let my life Thy witness be;
Touch this lens with living fire,
Magnify Thyself in me.

THE KING OF NATIONS.

Ever let us keep in mind,
Gift unspeakable and kind;
Gather all our powers to sing—
Comes Immanuel as King.

Stranger, homeless and unknown,
Angels yet His Kingship own;
David's Son and Lord is He,
Man's true Sovereign come to be.

He will chase earth's dreary night,
For of light He is the Light;
Peace, goodwill, to all He brings—
So the Christmas herald sings.

Gentiles far in Orient clime
Hail the dawning glow sublime;
Embassy of love, they bring
Tribute worthy of a King.

Slowly, surely spreads the day!
All the nations far away
Clearer yet His light shall see—
All shall soon His subjects be.

Hail with triumph, hail with song!
All your notes of joy prolong—
New creation, through His birth,
Christ is come to give to earth.

Never can His glory cease,
Ever must His reign increase;
Fill the air with carols sweet,
Draw the nations round His feet.

W. A. Essery.

Dr. Torrey at Mildmay.—A good example has been set by the local Wesleyan circuit, which, at the quarterly meeting a few days ago agreed to suspend all regular gatherings for one week during Dr. Torrey's mission at Mildmay Conference Hall. Such a step calls attention emphatically to the importance of the special effort, and by setting workers free to throw all their energy into it, does much to conserve and guide into proper channels the measure of blessing which the Lord may be pleased to grant.

On the Watch-Tower.

"What of the night?" (Isaiah xxi. 11)

By Rev. W. T. Turpin, M.A., Eastbourne.

ANOTHER shadow is nearly gone down on the great dial of time—another year will soon be numbered with the past. Its closing days and hours suggest the rapidly-approaching termination of the dealings of God in grace with a world that has rejected the Son of God, and, in the words of Holy Scripture, "lieth in the evil one" (1 John v. 19, R.V.) Standing, then, as we do just now, upon the confines of the dying year, it becomes us all solemnly and earnestly to ask the question, Where are we? "What of the night?"

First, let us observe that the person here addressed is called a "watchman," a sentry keeping watch, with wakeful eyes and measured step, through the long dreary hours of the night, open to be challenged as the only one who can give a true and accurate account of how things really are. Alas! how few there are who answer to this description. How much more true it is that the words, "They that sleep, sleep in the night," find their verification in the rulers and vast numbers of the ruled of our own beloved country at this time! Alas! how drowsy and insensible to the true state of things are so many just now. The bold and daring rejection of the truth is one of those dials upon which we may read the hour of the world's age: "Little children, it is the last hour" (1 John ii. 18, R.V.). The most fitting words to describe the present moment are the heart-breaking and solemn utterance of the prophet:

"FOR TRUTH IS FALLEN

in the street, and uprightness cannot enter. Yea, truth is lacking" (Isaiah lix. 14, 15, R.V.). It is very striking to note how fully alive and awake the watchman of Isaiah xxi. is. He replies at once without any delay; it is an immediately direct and decided rejoinder—"The morning cometh and also the night." It is night now, but a darker, drearier time is close at hand. Let us calmly survey the outlook at this moment.

When we look at the world around us, we are more than ever assured how rapidly it is hastening on to judgment; the words "and it was night," are terribly descriptive of the world's state, increasing and developing ever since the rejection of Him who is "King of kings and Lord of lords."

THE GREAT EVENT OF THIS PAST YEAR

has been the coronation of our gracious king, Edward the Seventh, but what place, we may ask, has the true King, Jesus Christ our Lord, in the mind of the nation or the counsels of its rulers? With all the progress in civilisation and art, with all the increase of knowledge, with all the tremendous strides both science and philosophy have taken of late, there is a refinement of iniquity in the world both dark and daring. Verily this is the world's night, very dark, very gloomy, and unrelieved by any light save what comes from above; yet it is as nothing to that which is coming, when the world will be left down in the night, behind in the night, to be overtaken by a thief in the night. There is at this moment, with all the boasted progress, a kind of universal dread, universal mistrust and insecurity, on all sides: so much so that at times the dreary, sullen silence is broken by the despairing question, "What is this to end in?" "What is the world coming to?"

These and such like are the sounds which continually reach our ears amid the closing hours of 1902. Alas! how few of us are more than half awake to the real present state both of the world and the Church. When we turn to contemplate the present condition of the professing Church the result is still more sad and appalling; the down-grade meets us at every turn and in every section of it. In the National Church, a high dignitary dares to speculate on the Virgin birth of our adorable Lord and Master, and this in the face of the plain words of Holy Scripture, and of the Articles and Creeds to which he solemnly subscribed.

Then in another direction the supporters and exponents of the great Catholic Revival, which really means Roman Revival, exhibit not only a like departure, I might almost say apostasy, from what they have sworn to maintain, but also in doing so have, in very many instances, assumed a position of avowed insubordination amounting almost to rebellion, against the very authority to which they promised obedience. It was usual to say in former times that the world corrupted the Church, but now things are changed, and we see

THE CHURCH CORRUPTING THE WORLD.

If for a moment we look outside the National Church of the country, we find what equally saddens the heart. Higher criticism and rationalistic materialism seem to threaten as an overflowing scourge the ranks of Nonconformity. Amongst those who would not class themselves as either Episcopalians or Nonconformists, there is a like down-grade tendency, and it is well known how irreverent and speculative questions concerning the blessed Person of our Lord Jesus Christ have divided them into various hostile parties, with the manifestation towards each other of a bitterness of spirit which is heart-breaking.

Amid all this, the Watchman, as described in our precious Bible, the Book of Hope, lights up the darkness around, and points to the coming morning. On this the Watchman's fixed and steady gaze was set. It was this beyond all else that was longed for, and we might almost hear him say: "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning: I say more than they that watch for the morning."

The morning watch is breaking,
The darkness fleeth fast;
He comes! And He is speaking!
(It is Himself at last),
"'Tis I; be not afraid."

The Week of Prayer.

THE World-wide Week of Prayer, organized by the Evangelical Alliance since 1848, begins this year on January 4. In London a great many meetings will be held, January 5 to 10 inclusive. There will be meetings at Exeter Hall daily at one o'clock, in Mildmay Conference Hall at 11 and 7.30, and at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. at noon.

The invitation and list of subjects, which can be obtained from the Evangelical Alliance, 7, Adam Street, Strand, are printed with the facsimile signatures of leading Christians of many lands. The list of signatures is larger than ever before, and shows how well the principle of the Alliance is maintained, that all the Christians of all the churches are One Body. In the most distant places, this week is held sacred, bringing together at one time the believers in every part of the world. In nations civilized and uncivilized, amongst the black races and the white and the yellow, these prayer gatherings are observed. In Corea the natives travel 300 miles to attend the meetings, and in Central Africa, in Tierra del Fuego, in inland China, the greatest interest is evinced. The Evangelical Alliance expresses the hope that in this country all Christians will endeavour to take part in prayer with their fellow-Christians.

"The Thinking-Time."

A CHRISTMAS INCIDENT.

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

THE last sweet notes had died away, the organist had replaced his stops, put up his music, and hurried off. Special Christmas music had been rendered in that little church, for the festive day was near.

Paul Ransen sat up in the corner of his pew, and watched the people as they passed out.

"Strange character!" they said of him, and no one heeded his remarks. He was not rich, nor could he rent a pew, but one seat he held and paid for, and regularly occupied, though at the back and rather out of sight.

He waited till the lights were put out, then, slowly rising and feeling sure that no one lingered but the man who had to lock the door, he spoke, and, being deaf himself, he lifted up his voice as if to make a deaf man hear.

"Ah, Johnson, I tell you this, the thinking time is coming by-and-by. That man of God has declared the message faithfully. How have we received it? And, mind you, he's got a heart to feel, and suffer too; and one day, when the reckoning comes, some of us will wish we thought about some things before." Clatter, clatter went the old man's stick as he cautiously descended the church steps.

"Good-night, Mr. Ransen. I think you're right. I guess I could mention a few as might think more on some practical subjects; but, bless you, they're studying the higher criticism and forgetting the things down here!"

"Johnson, hark you, hear!" and the stick emphasized the remark in a sudden thud on the lower step; "our parson's peace, and comfort, and well-being, and usefulness will be required at the hands of his people, specially those who are called his helpers; and my name ain't Paul Ransen if the thinking-time that's near don't reveal trouble. Happy Christmas to you; good-night!" The stick was heard in its helpful mission till Paul had turned the corner.

But everybody had not gone as had been imagined. Deacon Lister had returned, after counting out the money, to fetch a book he wanted; but hearing the voice of the man who had once annoyed him by his plain speaking, he stood back behind the lobby door, thinking he would avoid him, and he heard every word. The book was left, he walked away, hearing the church door locked behind him.

"You are very quiet," said Mrs. Lister as they sat at supper; "what did you think of our man to-night? I think things are getting worse; we want real dash and style. It isn't so comfortable to be reminded of your duty, and have your faults pointed out, and that like."

Not a word of usual complaint, and she wondered what could have happened to her husband.

"Peace on earth, goodwill to men!" twice over repeated the old minister; then turning to his wife, whose face wore an anxious look, he said: "Forget it all, my dear, and let us hear His voice who said, 'My peace I give unto you.' I know 'tis hard to bear the coldness, the absence of real warm cheer and help. But the Master had to bear it; shall we murmur?"

"But I'm dwelling on the thought of how your work is checked and hindered. I dream of what might be, if only they would think and act!" she replied.

"Time may come when they will. But this is Christmas, and all are eager about themselves; and we have our cares, too. There's Harry, our invalid; if only I had the means, he shouldn't want for best attention, and you should be freer from the carking care that lurks behind that smiling face so often," he said with a sigh.

"And yet you might have had your chance of making money and becoming independent; only you gave up for——"

"Hush! I would rather serve my Lord, even if those I serve for Him are forgetful; there's a reckoning coming soon. Meanwhile, 'peace, goodwill to men,' and may He grant it!"

There was merriment and glee in many homes that Christmas Day, and few could know the shadows they had cast on that one man's heart.

Deacon Lister stepped out into the cold on Christmas evening. The day had passed slowly to him, for all along he had seen the truth of Ransen's words, and if his "parson's" peace, comfort, well-being, and usefulness would be required at his hands, he knew it would be a sorry time for him. He argued angrily with his wife when she defended him. "And don't I know wherein I've failed? I might have helped, not hindered, and cheered instead of chilling; and you may say what you like, we're wrong, and deserve to be made to feel it."

The night was sharp; under the lamp-lights the frost glittered as he made his way to Deacon Hewlen's house.

"I want you alone for five minutes," he said, as the cheery little man came out of his warm room to meet him. He repeated Paul Ransen's words, and grew excited as he spoke; for the indifferent and smiling face of the fellow-deacon agitated him.

"It never occurred to me we were responsible, and I'm wondering what the last reckoning may mean," said Lister.

"Oh, it's all very well. I think there's room for improvement in pulpit and pew!" said easy-going Hewlen. "Why listen to Ransen?"

"I'm losing patience, for it's all come to me as a revelation, and I see how we have held back and played the part of cowards." And Deacon Lister rose to go.

"Stay, what could we or any one do to make matters better?" asked Hewlen. "Suppose we supplement the salary!"

"That's beginning at the lowest end—that's covering a sore, not healing it. I'm as much to blame as any; but I take it he wants full-hearted sympathy. Don't you recall his words last Sunday: 'We want a zeal and love that will bubble over, so that everyone who enters these doors shall see and be electrified by their effect'? Certainly we have proved what the opposite to that can do," said Lister, moving uneasily in his chair.

"Upon my word this isn't a pleasant subject for Christmas. I wasn't troubling about ministers to-day. We'll think about this matter some other time." And the deacons shook hands and parted.

The year of disappointed hopes and crippled circumstances upon a weakened constitution had developed a latent disease, and on Christmas evening the old minister was suddenly stricken down. The patient and all too sensitive wife administered restoratives and sent for the doctor; but all in vain.

"Ah, I'm glad he'll know someone is beginning to think," said Lister, approaching the door. "It may put a bit of cheer into him." And rapping, he felt the first glow of pleasure enter his selfish heart, so soon to turn to grief.

The doctor came out, and answered him in passing: "Terribly sad. Your minister is dead!" Lister dared not venture with his pity. He returned. The "thinking-time" had come too late!

The Glory That Shall Be Revealed.

(Rom. viii. 18.)

A little brown seed, of a dingy hue,
Deep down in the earth was laid;
Its place was marked by a cross of wood,
And there all the winter it stayed.

"Ah, me!" it sighed, "I am dead and gone,
And nobody cares for me;
My body is ugly, and brown, and decayed,
I am not as I used to be."

But one bright day in the early spring
Burst open a tiny grave,
And a fair pale shaft of dewy green
Its earthly covering clave.

The weeks passed on and the green shaft grew
To a vision wondrous fair;
A lily, so stately, tall and pure—
A lily of beauty rare.

Have ye read thro' the lines of my little song?
Then fear not, O Christ's one, to die;
This life is only the earnest, the seed
Of what ye shall be by and by.

Clothed in God's purity, dazzling white,
To the measure of Christ shall we grow;
But what glories for us are yet unrevealed
Not even the glorified know. K. M. F.

The Passing Year.

As another year in the tale of time nears completion, various and solemnizing reflections engage the serious mind. The year's movement and change, its turmoil and disappointment, should impress even the less thoughtful among us with the truth that "here we have no continuing city." This is an old message, presented by occurrences in nature and providence, and brought home to king and peasant without respect of person or distinction of country.

At the outset, we praise God that this has been a year of grace—a year in which "goodness and mercy" have been the assured lot of all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. In all lands, men and women have held up holy hands and received abundance of grace through the Holy Spirit given unto us. That God raised up His Servant Jesus, and sent Him to bless men in turning them from their iniquities, has been attested from time to time throughout the great harvest field, and the fact is declared with joy and to the praise of God.

During the year many royal personages, including a large number of potentates from lands that are generally regarded as beyond the confines of civilization, have visited our shores. As being Coronation Year, this was to be expected. Many prayers have ascended to God that the things seen and heard in our midst may exercise the minds of our influential and high-born visitors in such a way as shall qualify them the better to discharge the functions of their exalted stations among what are known as "the backward races of mankind."

NATIONAL BLESSINGS.

Many national blessings call for thankful recognition. When the year opened, the lamentable war in South Africa was still raging, and blood and treasure were being poured out, with terrible consequences of sorrow and distress on both sides. In the month of May, when the conflict had, for two-and-a-half years, been a cause of pain to Christian people and the subject of much prayer to the God of peace, the cessation of hostilities came in sight. On June 1 news was received that terms of peace had been agreed upon between Britons and Boers, and great was the joy and satisfaction excited by the intelligence throughout the empire. The problems connected with the settlement of the colonies are now to engage the Colonial Secretary, who departed for South Africa just a month ago. Let us pray the God of all mercy to follow the blessing of peace with that of prosperity for the lands that have so long been the scene of bloodshed and devastation.

The recovering of our King from the gates of death in June is another cause of profound gratitude to God. When the joyous Summer-month arrived, the coronation of our monarch and his beloved consort had been awaited with interest for full six months; on December 10, 1901, the King signed a proclamation fixing June 26 as the date of his coronation. When within a few days of the date, however, His Majesty showed signs of weakness, resulting as it was thought from over-strain consequent upon the preliminary festivities; and when the long-anticipated day arrived, King Edward was prostrate with exhaustion, a serious surgical operation having been necessary for the preservation of his life. "Man proposes; but God disposes!"

Great was the consternation that prevailed during those days throughout the empire; and many who were expecting to witness scenes of pomp and pageantry gave themselves to prayer that God would save the King. A gracious Lord "hearkened and heard," and in a remarkably short time His Majesty was convalescent, and gathered strength once more. The deferred coronation came off very happily on August 9, and is still well in the memory of most of us. Surely here is reason for praise to God. And may He who, once and again, answered prayer by bringing our King, as it were, from the brink of the grave, still hear our petition when we continually invoke His favour in the familiar phrase—"God Save the King!"

EVANGELISTIC ENTERPRISE.

The great work of Evangelization has gone forward with unabated zeal; and from all lands news has been received of the progress of the Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. Not that there has been weaker opposition among the heathen, or less indifference among the stolid masses at home; but, on the other hand, the light has shone in the darkness, and the darkness has not been able to overcome it (cf. John i. 5, R.V. marg.) In China, where in recent years the devil has displayed great wrath, "because he knoweth he hath but a short time" (Rev. xii. 12), there is an improved outlook. In India, Christian beneficence has followed in the wake of famine and plague, and "a great door and effectual" has been opened for the Gospel of God. Varied circumstances have advanced the cause of Christ in other lands, where until quite lately it was hindered by many adversaries.

In the spring there was a Mission to Children, organised by the Sunday School Union, in the homelands, and it was a joy to hear of many young folk listening for the heavenly call, and giving the ready reply—"Speak Lord, for Thy servant heareth." As the months have passed, quite a host of evangelists have been moving hither and thither, stirring up the churches in town and country. And in a degree without parallel in our time, it has been customary to combine Bible instruction with personal appeal. Clergymen and pastors in all parts have testified to the encouraging results accruing from these methods. A declaration of God's Word against sin, and His grace in pardoning the sinner, has led many to repentance and life in Christ; while an unfolding of the Scriptures, as they relate to life and godliness, and reveal the mind and will of God, has brought great blessing to many Christian people.

In the Antipodes a remarkable movement has been witnessed, in association with the work of Dr. R. A. Torrey, superintendent of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute at Chicago. For some years past this evangelist has been a blessing to the churches of America. In the beginning of the year he commenced a tour round the world, and, after visiting Japan and China, went to Australasia. The Melbourne Simultaneous Mission was a time of revival which will long be remembered; and in other colonies of the southern hemisphere the power of the Lord has been present to heal the wounded soul and satisfy the thirsty spirit.

Passing on to India, Dr. Torrey, accompanied by Mr. C. Alexander, who sings the Gospel, has held missions in several large cities of the peninsula. He hopes to reach England in about a fortnight, and to begin work in the Mildmay Conference Hall on January 7. May he come "in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ!" For a long time we have been praying that God would revive His Church and bless His people to the world at large. Let us plead that the "set time" to favour Zion may come speedily!

The great drink curse continues with us. Men and women, whether associated or not, are crying unto God to send release to the land; drunkards in their moral ruin, and homes desolated by the evil, call to heaven for vengeance on the wicked system. Throughout the year, Dr. J. Q. A. Henry has been addressing meetings in the United Kingdom. His word has been with power, and the same may be said of the labours of his singing colleague, Mr. Armon Jones.

RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.

The embers of religious controversy have been fanned to flame during the year, consequent upon the introduction into Parliament of the Education Bill—now the Education Act. To set out the provisions and characteristics of the measure, either as introduced, or as amended by the Legislature, is unnecessary; both in what it proposes and what it neglects to provide, it has given offence to politicians of all shades. Beyond that, it has been looked upon by many as outraging the public sense of reason and justice, for it was proposed to Parliament without any mandate from the constituencies, and after an election in which Liberals and Conservatives, Churchmen and Dissenters, to a large degree sank their differences on a patriotic appeal presented in plain and urgent terms. It will be long before the last is heard of this popular complaint.

There is, however, a more serious objection to the new law. As Evangelical Protestants of all shades have been contending for months past, the Act is one which will foster an unworthy sectarianism. Whatever else it may do, this law supports denominational schools as such by funds provided by the ratepayers in general. Hence Protestants are made to support schools in which Roman Catholicism is taught; and Dissenters, by like means, become legally responsible for the maintenance of High Church doings in thousands of national schools in our land. Not having called for such a law, Evangelicals, both in the Church of England and out of it, have made their voices heard, and from a thousand platforms the story of Puritan devotion and fidelity in the seventeenth century has been rehearsed, and Christian men and women have been encouraged to pray and work for the speedy breaking of the fetters which Parliament has been forging for their consciences, and for the undoing of legislation which is assuredly calculated to promote Romanism and Ritualism.

SOME EVENTS OF NOTE.

Among the important events of the year, so far as our own land is concerned, we should not omit to mention the retirement of the Marquis of Salisbury from active political life. In July last his lordship resigned the post of Prime Minister, and was succeeded by Mr. Balfour. During a long period of years, the noble marquis has served his country in many ways, with great ability and distinction.

By the death of the Right Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes in March a notable figure was removed from this scene of earth. As founder of the territory of Rhodesia in South Africa, he was a man of vast concerns; life yielded him little satisfaction, however, for among his dying utterances was one which points a lesson we all do well to learn: "So much to do, and so little done!"

Solemn thoughts were suggested in May, June, and July, when there were volcanic eruptions in Martinique and St. Vincent, resulting in the loss of many thousands of lives. Large populations live as it were on the brink of destruction, indifferent to the perils that may at any moment overwhelm them. These disasters suggested morals that were as sad as they were solemn.

The recent visit of the German Emperor to our Royal Family was attended by many incidents of a singularly happy order. May God give His blessing upon every such display of good feeling and concord! The warlike proceedings in Venezuela during the past fortnight, in which our Government has co-operated with that of the German Empire, will, it is sincerely hoped, not eventuate in bloodshed or estrangement among powers hitherto friendly.

LABOURERS AT REST.

Death has made sad inroads upon the hosts of the Lord. Many whose labour was the prayerful concern of our readers have entered into the rest and peace which God giveth His beloved ones. John Kensit finished his course with joy on October 8, having been stricken to death while discharging his duty as a bold witness for Christ. Among other worthies gone home must be named, Joseph Parker, Hugh Price Hughes, Newman Hall, Joseph Angus, John Thomas Wigner, and George Rawlinson (Canon). These were widely known as preachers or authors, some in both capacities.

Among men who led a more retired but not less useful life may be named: Leonard K. Shaw, R. C. Chapman, George Pearse, John Jewell Penstone, George C. Needham, and Major Conran, who finished their course after devoted service. In how many circles in London is Dr. J. H. Gladstone missed, and how do Indian missionaries deplore the loss of their noble helper in good works, Rev. Dennis Osborne, of Poona! The world seems cold for the stilling of so many warm hearts; but, in the famous words of John Wesley, "The best of all is, God is with us."

Other Lands.

The Root of India's Need.

An English officer was talking to some native officers about the plague. He spoke of the objections made by natives to precautionary measures, and pointed out how greatly this increases the difficulty as compared with any similar outbreak in England. One of the native officers replied: "Sahib, it is not the remedy we fear, but the administration of it. In England you work these things through Europeans, but in India they have to be worked through natives." He then went on to explain how oppression and corruption accompany the working of precautionary measures, and gave an example of famine relief which had happened in his own village. Ten rupees had been given for the relief of a starving household. But there were two native intermediaries, each of whom appropriated four rupees, leaving a balance of two rupees which reached the unfortunate householder!

The native officer, who was a Mohammedan, proceeded to comment on the general situation. "Sahib, these things (the famine and the plague) are judgments of God. The land is full of lying and corruption, and so these things come upon us. But they do us no good. The people go on stealing and lying. They say that if they do not steal they will starve, and if they do steal the worst that can happen is that they will go to gaol, and there the Government will feed them."

What a comment this is on the Inspired Word—"They are corrupt, they have done abominable works; there is none that doeth good." The greatest cause of India's troubles is its moral corruption. Lying and dishonesty abound. It is this which makes the difference between India and England. Civilization and wealth do not make them honest. India's trouble is the world's trouble.

"The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek after God. They are all gone aside; they are together become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no not one."

And India's need is the world's need—the Gospel of the Son of God. When the salt of the earth is scattered plentifully throughout the land, this terrible corruption will be held in check. Righteousness exalteth a nation. When India becomes a "righteous nation which keepeth truth," God will bless her, and the blessing of God will make her rich.

HOW ALONE THE NEED MAY BE MET.

What can Christian England do to help India? We can give India a good government. This is right and necessary. This we ought to do, but there is something else which we ought not to leave undone. Government cleanses, as it were, the outside. But it is far more important to cleanse the inside. Otherwise India will remain like a whited sepulchre. Within, it will still be full of all uncleanness. The righteousness which alone can exalt the nation will be lacking.

What can English Christians do to help India? A study of our Lord's instructions in Matt. ix. 38, x. 5-8, gives us three key-words—"Pray—Labour—Give."

1. Pray for India. Pray the fervent prayer, the prayer of the righteous man which availeth much. Pray first for India's Christians, and for Christians in India. The salt is not entirely lacking, but if the salt have lost its savour wherewith shall India be salted? Putting aside all false accusations and exaggerations, it is still sadly true that there are sins and inconsistencies among the Lord's children in India, both native converts and British residents. English Christians in India need the prayers of Christians at home. And so do the native converts in their extremely difficult surroundings.

Pray, therefore, that the Christians may be without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. Pray that the salt may not lose its savour.

But the salt is very scarce. It is difficult to realize how scarce it is. When numbers rise to millions the words convey little to our minds; we are incapable of grasping them. And so it happens that the departure of fifty missionaries from England is liable to impress us more than the thought of fifty million souls in darkness in a distant land. But there things look very different. Mission stations are so often undermanned; there is so much to do, and there are so few to do it; and there are so many places where new stations might be opened if men and means were available. These lines are written in one of the frontier districts of the Indian Empire. Mission stations lie three weeks' journey from one another, and there are tribes whose language has yet to be reduced to writing. Drunkenness, gambling, and immorality abound.

2. It is useless for us to pray for holiness if we are unwilling to be holy; and it is equally useless for us to pray for labourers if we are unwilling to labour. The Lord has given to every man his work. Let the minister keep before his congregation the infinite need of the heathen world, and the solemn duty of uttermost surrender to the Lord who has bought us with His own blood. Let the Sunday-school teacher seek to win not only the souls of the children, but their bodies, and teach them to go whithersoever the Lord shall send them. Let individual Christians seek to interest others in missionary work. This is an excellent way to overcome our own forgetfulness of our Lord's command. The mission field is as much part of the Church's work as the mission hall. It is necessary to keep both supplied with workers. Let us not only pray to the Lord of the harvest to thrust forth labourers, but let us be fellow-workers with Him in this matter.

A GREAT THAW REQUIRED.

3. Give. We need to remember that the labourer is worthy of his hire. Those who go forth need to be supported. And their work needs to be supported. To give away food, clothing, and medicine, to dig wells, to build schools, hospitals, and chapels, to scatter Christian literature—these and other efforts cost money. How often the missionary is limited in his work by want of money. God has given ample funds to His Church; but the money does not flow freely. When our pipes are frozen, water has to be carried in buckets. This is a laborious method, and the supply is unsatisfactory. The Church too often works by the bucket system. There are laborious special efforts to raise funds, and the resulting supply is too often insufficient. In some cases, too, the buckets are not over-clean; the means used are questionable. What is needed is a general thaw, a rise of Church temperature, so that along every appointed channel the money will flow freely. "Freely ye have received, freely give."

A red-hot Christian will give unasked far more than could ever be pumped out of him by special efforts in his lukewarm state. Therefore we need to pray to God to revive His Church, and we need to watch against lukewarmness. Faithful preaching, backed up by fervent prayer, is also required. Lack of funds is not a disease, but it is a symptom of disease. Too many special efforts deal only with the symptom, leaving the disease itself untouched. The disease is selfishness in some form or other, which is sin. There is too much love of pleasure and luxury, and therefore Christians fail to obey the command to love God with the whole heart. The preacher can attack the disease itself. He can go to the root of the matter, as the prophets Haggai and Malachi did. Such preaching, in the power of Holy Spirit, will not be in vain.

Can we, whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high—
Can we to men benighted
The lamp of life deny?

These lines contain a solemn truth. Let each one face it boldly, and may God give us grace to answer the question practically by each one doing what he can. A. H. W.

An Interesting Mission.

ST. CHRISCHONA is the name of an ancient church situate on the summit of a hill about five miles from Basle, in Switzerland. Little is known of the origin of this place of worship, but an old inscription in the aisle says that it was "restored" to the service of God in 1516. Before the Reformation it was a place of pilgrimage; afterwards it was used for occasional services on holidays till the terrible devastations of the Thirty Years' War reached even this secluded spot. The Swedish soldiers did their work of destruction with thoroughness, even the lead of the window-frames being melted down for bullets! For nearly two centuries the building remained a desolation.

To-day St. Chrischona is the centre of a mission agency which dispenses blessing in many lands. How this came about is soon related. In the early part of last century there lived in Basle a man full of faith, love, and prayer, Mr. C. F. Spittler. In 1815 he gave the chief impetus towards the foundation of the Basle Missionary Society, now grown into a wide-spreading tree with missionaries in India, China, and Africa. But he still saw needs unsupplied at home and abroad, and he felt that there was yet much work for many more labourers. He was wont to say, "Let us work and pray to bring Christianity to the heathen; but let us also work and pray to save so-called Christians from heathenism."

A MOUNTAIN SANCTUARY.

A trial was made as early as 1827, when several humble but devoted men were sent to Austria and Belgium. Spittler's wish was to gather a number of young men of the artisan class, to give them Biblical instruction and training, and to send them forth as industrial missionaries—to gain their livelihood by handiwork, and at the same time to preach the Gospel. For some years he sought in vain for a house in which he might carry out his plan. Suddenly the thought struck him: Might not the lonely church on the mountain be the Home he was seeking? He went to the Government office, and begged leave to restore the ruined church, and to found therein a school of evangelists. The wish was acceded to, and the ancient building was let to him at a nominal rent.

In 1840 an earnest Christian man, a convert from Romanism, presented himself at St. Chrischona as the first pilgrim missionary. Thus the work at St. Chrischona was inaugurated. For many years the students lived in the tower of the church, but towards 1860 this became insufficient, and a house was built hard by. Since then expansion has been steady, and to-day St. Chrischona is a small village with sixty students in residence. In the course of time new branches of the work have been put in action, as, for instance, a Home of Rescue. There is also a printing and book-binding establishment in connection with the Mission. The society has several missionaries working in China, but in general the students are prepared for home mission work.

The writer recently paid a short visit to this greatly blessed institution. He was struck by the charm of its position, situated as it is nearly 1,700 feet above the sea-level, and crowning a lovely wooded hill. Not only do the natural surroundings impress one; the inner spiritual life manifested itself as healthful and vigorous.

For thirty-five years the institution has been under the direction of Inspector Rappard, who is assisted in his work by a staff of teachers. Yearly conferences are held in the Ebenezer Hall, which was built in 1890, as a jubilee gift from former students. The Hall seats 2,000 people, and during the conferences is often full. In the July conference of last year two brethren kept their twenty-fifth year of service; one other worker counts fifty years since he left the institution! Though issuing no appeals, the work receives steady support, and the last report acknowledges the kind help of British Christians. D. G. T.

Loud Calls from Morocco.

A CRISIS IN SOUTH MOROCCO.

I AM greatly concerned to read that the dwindling support received by the Southern Morocco Mission has brought about a crisis in its affairs which threatens to necessitate the closing of stations and the withdrawal of missionaries. I do not hesitate to say that this must not be.

Originating indirectly through articles published in these columns, the Southern Morocco Mission has for fourteen years preached Christ by life and deed as well as by word in one of the least promising fields we know, manfully facing discouragement, prayerfully facing the foe. I wish I could tell something of what I have seen of the work in almost every station, and what I know from direct native sources to be the effect produced; but I can only state that it is work which every Christian should feel privileged to support.

The present crisis arises solely from the smallness of the circle interested in the Mission, which deserves to be better known. It is an undenominational faith mission, directed by the founder, Mr. John Anderson, head of the Bible-Training Institute in Glasgow. The utmost allowance to the missionaries is—when funds suffice—£60 a year for men and £50 for women, out of which the report says that liberal contributions are returned to the general fund. Yet a deficit of nearly £600 has mounted up, and cannot be increased. The only alternative to retrenchment in the field appears to be to bring one worker away from his work to organize support at home. Surely even this might be avoided. It is bad enough to overwork missionaries on furlough in this way; it is worse to break up work for the purpose, to say nothing of the expense. Cannot an outside effort be made at once to wipe out the deficit, and then by widened and deepened interest to maintain the Mission at its full strength?

CHEER IN CENTRAL MOROCCO.

In his annual report, Dr. Robert Kerr, director of the Central Morocco Mission, is able to give a cheering account of progress at Rabat and other centres. Fanaticism has been gradually breaking down, doors of usefulness have been opening wider, and there has been a willingness to listen and receive the word, which surpasses the most hopeful experiences of former years.

There has been an ever-increasing demand for New Testaments, Gospels, and other Christian literature, both among the Jews and Moslems. When walking down one of the principal streets of our city in the month of July, a teacher from one of the adjacent tribes, after saluting Dr. Kerr, greeted him with the cheering inquiry: "Can you furnish me with a complete record of the life of Jesus Christ?" When asked where he had heard about Jesus Christ and the New Testament, he replied: "I heard of Him through reading some Gospels which you gave to a teacher, but the record was not complete."

RACIAL ANTIPATHIES.

"We have been exceptionally busy in the dispensary this year. It has been open every day, Sabbaths excepted—then we only attend to cases of accident or of emergency. Over 10,000 have been treated. Of these, some 7,000 have visited the Mission House—1,050 females being included in the number—and I have made 1,000 visits to the homes of the people in Rabat. I have also made seventy-five crossings to Salli, and have visited an average of four patients each time.

"There has been an increasing desire, on the part of both Moslems and Jews, to have their children vaccinated. Over 700 of these have been vaccinated this year, and in this way many doors of usefulness have been opened. The work has been hampered through lack of accommodation, as caste exists here as it does in India. To make Moslems and Jews sit together almost invariably leads to unpleasantness, and the respectable townspeople will not sit by the side of Arabs. This greatly adds to the labour, but it is a delight to see them."

The secretary of the Central Morocco Mission is Mr. Grahame Wilson, 191, Meadowpark Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow.

From Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Mount Olivet, Jamaica, November 29.

I HAVE just come in from addressing a great congregation of coloured people on my favourite Advent text: "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed"; and I have taught them the words of that marvellous prayer, which always stirs me at this season as the pibroch does the Highlander: "Almighty God, give us grace that we may cast away the works of darkness, and put upon us the armour of light now in the time of this mortal life, in which Thy Son Jesus Christ came to visit us in great humility."

My congregation has dispersed, I have seen their white dresses and (what look like) straw hats passing down into the valleys which surround this lovely spot, 4,500ft. above the sea-level; and from the upper windows of the manse, I see the evening swiftly settling down on the hills and mountains grouped around, richly clothed with verdure.

The week, for the most part, has been spent in Mandeville, almost in the centre of the island, and at the heart of the orange district, where Bishop Dewey has welcomed us to the parish church, and Christian ministers and workers have gathered from a wide area. Mr. Macartney and I have given four or five addresses a day, with the Holy Spirit's aid. Still there have been marked and blessed results—God's ministering servants have seen the way of God more perfectly, Christians have been quickened, and

LARGE NUMBERS OF PEOPLE REACHED.

Last night we spoke to men and women separately. The number of illegitimate births, as shown in the last census, are 65 per 100; it being the custom for men and women to live together without marriage, that either may be free to seek another home if the partner misbehaves. The attraction between young men and women savours too largely of the evils of the old slavery times; and I felt that it might be possible for us, as strangers, to remonstrate, and to urge for better things, as perhaps those could not do, who knew the people more intimately. I specially urged on the young Christian girls to insist on being courted for the soul that was in them, and advocated that they and their lovers should walk together for a little before the irrevocable step was taken. The men's audience was very quiet; but it will take more than a speech or two to alter some of the terrible customs which obtain, and which are constantly robbing the churches of their fairest children.

For the most part our addresses have been directed to the searching of our hearers' hearts, and the unfolding of the fulness of Christ. The former seems to fall specially to my share, and the latter to Mr. Macartney's. But it is very difficult indeed to know how to handle these audiences. If you ask for an after-meeting, everyone stops. If you ask for an indication of decision, all hands are raised. If you touch emotion too deeply, your audience may become physically affected. The other day a friend of mine invited all the prisoners in Kingston Gaol who were on the Lord's side to stand up, and, to his astonishment, the whole of the poor men and women, perhaps 300 in number, and comprising some of the greatest ruffians in Jamaica, rose. The soil seems very shallow, the seed springs up at once, but fades. Of course, there are hundreds of noble and conspicuous exceptions — beautiful souls, in whom are all the graces of the Spirit! But these are found where there have been years of careful instruction and oversight.

God's servants in this island need our prayers that they may not be discouraged, and may be partakers in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. In addition to their arduous labours, they have to contend with the enervating character of the climate, which is very relaxing—at least, I have felt it so, and one has longed for the tonic of a regular north-easter—I could not have believed that I should come to make such a confession!

The country is rich to a degree. Oranges grow in very great profusion, and litter the ground as apples do in our orchards. Bananas, pines, yams, plantains, and other fruits abound; but it is almost impossible to obtain remunerative prices. The coffee-berries are left on the trees as not worth picking; sugar is grown in small quantities because the beet sugar and the bounties have made the trade unprofitable. In point of fact, the banana trade seems the one hope of the country, coupled with the fact that wealthy Americans are making Jamaica a winter resort. The Governor told me that out of 13,000 visitors last year, 10,000 were Americans.

But if Jamaica needs millions of money to revive her industries, much more does she need Christ, and Christians who shall settle in her beautiful mountains to supplement the work of the ministers with their devoted labours and consistent testimony. Oh, for another breath of God's lips to pass over this land, convicting of sin, righteousness, and judgment, and glorifying the Son of God! Breathe, O Word of God, on the slain that they may live, and on Immanuel's garden that its spices may flow forth!

F. B. Meyer.

From Dr. Len. G. Broughton.

FOR a long time I have promised to make good my promise to drop you a line from across the Atlantic, but have been excessively busy. I read The Christian with great interest. Each week when it comes I stop everything else and go through it. I feel now and then as if I were at Keswick once more, as I see the names of Revs. Evan Hopkins, F. S. Webster, H. W. Webb-Peploe, and others. I shall never cease thanking God for my visit to Keswick the summer before last, and for my stay in London. My people say they feel the same way, for they have received some of the blessings resulting. I hope to be able to cross again this summer, bringing Mrs. Broughton with me.

How we grieve over the departure of Dr. Parker. He was greatly admired by thousands, but by none more than myself. Our Tabernacle work in Atlanta is getting very heavy. I have had to cancel all outside engagements for six months, that I might give myself wholly to it. We have gone from 250 members to 1,400 in less than four years. We have a number of institutions and missions, and it is taking my whole time to make it all go.

We have our fourth Bible Conference in March. Rev. G. Campbell Morgan is one of our main speakers. We run ten days. Pray for us.

A Harvest for Thee.

(Hosea vi. 11.)

O Judah, remembered before thy God,
"A harvest is set for thee"—
Long hast thou been smitten beneath His rod,
All lands thy wandering feet have trod—
Again shall thy sons be free.

O Lion of princely Judah's line,
"A harvest is set for Thee"—
The labour, the toil, and the pain were Thine,
For Thee is the glory, the joy Divine,
The fruit of Thy work to see.

O worker for God, though the days be long,
"A harvest is set for thee"—
Let courage and patience and faith be strong!
For sower and reaper shall join in song—
And thine shall the harvest be. M. A. B.

Nyassa Industrial Mission.—We are asked to state that there is at present a fine sphere of labour open for a new worker in connection with the Nyassa Industrial Mission. Recent letters mention several places where "there are plenty of people, but God's Word is never carried to them." A man is desired who has had experience of mission work at home, and who possesses some aptitude for the management of men, as to him would fall the superintendence of the native industrial work on the Likubula station. The secretary of the Mission is Mr. Alfred Walker, Sandrock, Sevenoaks.

A Brave Young Missionary.

THE LATE MISS CARINE FYSH.

THE home-call which came to Miss Carina Fysh, of the Zambezi Industrial Mission, has been felt as a personal bereavement by many who were engaged or interested in Gospel effort in Central Africa. She was a native of Tasmania, and her father was an earnest Christian merchant in Launceston. Her uncle, Sir Philip Fysh, was formerly Agent-General for the colony in London, and is now a member of the Australian Federal Government.

Having been brought to the Lord early in life, and seeking avenues of usefulness, she first qualified herself as a nurse, and was then led to ask admission to the Melbourne Missionary Training Home, under the charge of Dr. and Mrs. Warren. The best testimony to the influence on her life of the time spent there is to be found in letters which were received from her after she had gone forth to the field. In the Home she experienced a fuller revelation of the "life abundant" which the Lord has provided for His own, and invites each of them to share.

About two years ago, Miss Fysh was accepted and sent to Africa by the Australian Council of the Zambezi Industrial Mission. On reaching her destination full advantage was taken of her early training by placing her in charge of the hospital at Chiole, about one hundred miles north of Blantyre, in British Central Africa. The work was hard and trying, the medical and surgical patients sometimes numbering one hundred per day. While she was in charge, an epidemic of smallpox swept over the district, and hundreds of men and women came for treatment while suffering from the loathsome disease. Miss Fysh did not flinch from the task thus imposed upon her, Europeans and natives alike being full of praise for her devotion and loving ministry.

Behind all the medical work was the true missionary yearning for the souls of the people; and the terrible nature of the conflict with heathenism was soon borne in upon her soul. Again and again there came the sense of failure in the efforts to instil spiritual truth into the darkened minds; but her touch with the spiritual things was close, and in the hour of disappointment there was ever renewed the sense of God's own comfort and presence. The ardent young missionary was an enthusiast in the visitation of the people in the villages, going from hut to hut, and seeking specially to win the souls of the women. One of her latest letters to the office of the Mission contained the following sentences:—

THE CHRISTIAN is very full. I do like it, and am very grateful to the home workers for sending it. I shall be sorry to leave Chiole, but only desire to do God's perfect will. The dear old women are just as dark and needy everywhere. I have been after them this afternoon, and had some straight talks with some very aged ones, who, alas! seem so hard and regardless of eternal things. "The upright shall dwell in Thy presence" (Psa. cxl. 13). This promise has been so sweet to me during the last day or two. Whatever we are at, sewing, writing, preaching, or praying, one is dwelling in the place by Him, of safety and happiness.

Writing a few months ago to a friend, she said:—

This last month I have had the joy of visiting among the villages (one of the brothers taking the school). Simply to go forth seeking the lost is such direct work for the Good Shepherd, and I find it draws one so near Him. Of course school, housekeeping, and dressing wounds need the fulness of the Spirit just as much; but it is sweet to be directly engaged in spiritual work.

The occurrence among their number of a fatal case of African fever was in itself a heavy blow to the missionaries. So long a time had elapsed since a gap had been made in the ranks by this pestilence, that they had begun to hope that, for them at least, the bitterness of the scourge was past. Suddenly and terribly these hopes were dashed to the ground. Mrs. Galloway, a fellow-missionary, was sent for when Miss Fysh became unwell, and treated her as the symptoms called for; but she writes that on the fourth day (October 1)—

Miss Fysh called me to her and told me someone had said to her that the Lord wanted her to go home. I told her how much we needed her, and reminded her of how much work there still remained to be done, speaking specially of the coming mission about which we had prayed so often; but she said, "It's no use, Dona, I heard the Lord say distinctly, 'Come home to-day.'" After a little she said, "You do not understand, I know I am dying—I am going home to Jesus." Again I took her temperature. She was only 101 deg. I thought perhaps she was drowsy with the fever, so talked to her as brightly as possible. She seemed a little restless, so I sent for Mr. Price, and together we raised her up on her pillows and prayed with her. She told him she was going home.

When we pleaded with God to give her strength and grant her a speedy recovery, she said, "No, no, let me go;" but when we asked that the Lord's will might be done, she responded "Amen." A time of quietness followed, and she seemed to take no notice of us; but we heard her say, "Washed, washed, washed in the blood of the Lamb! I shall see Him, I shall know Him, I shall be like Him." After awhile she spoke again, "I shall see Jesus, and father and Lil." As the night wore away she expressed a wish to see the morning dawn, so I put the lights out and drew the curtains from the window. She much enjoyed the glorious sight, and seemed bright and happy.

Throughout the day it was not thought by those beside Miss Fysh that the end of her earthly career was at hand; but in the evening her temperature rose alarmingly, and while Mrs. Galloway was busy attending to her, she passed away to be with the King, peaceful and triumphant. The testimony of those who knew her best is that no one could help loving her. The beauty of her Christian life appealed to all. Nothing was allowed to come between her and her Master or His work. The special mission which was being planned was much on her heart, and in her prayers. "Faithful unto death" are the words used by a colleague.

The Paris Missionary Society has issued a letter to pastors and friends in France and elsewhere asking that Sunday, January 25, 1903, may be set apart as a Day of Missions, when the difficulties and responsibilities of mission work shall be brought before God in fervent prayer. The work of this Society is embarrassed by a heavy deficit; its friends may therefore be glad to act upon the suggestion from headquarters.

Persecution in Bolivia.

WRITING some weeks ago from Cochabamba, Bolivia, Mr. W. Payne says:—"When we commenced meetings here I knew a little of the danger, but still could not turn away from the open door. As soon as I could get seats made and things in order we began meetings with an attendance of from 150 to 300 persons. Of course many opposed, and excitement got to boiling point. Excommunication was issued. To attend a meeting was pecado reservado, and only pardoned by going on the knees to the bishop. Sermons were preached in all the churches. I was accused before the criminal court. The police and prefect were urged to put a stop to us. All this only served to send more people to listen.

"Then came a new order of things. Lying slanders were circulated. I carried with me the 'special presence' of the devil, had blasphemed the Blessed Virgin, and every one passing should say, 'Maria, Jesus, José.'

"Mothers, sisters, wives, must persecute us, and any man who attended our meetings. This also failed, and Rome reverted to her friend, the ignorant mass, which is a mighty weapon in Bolivia. Under the cloak of a demonstration in favour of the municipality (who were friendly to the priests), a public meeting was called, and the Biatas (a society of ladies who devote themselves to religious matters) forced the Indians to come in from their fincas, leagues away, to swell the numbers. At noon on Sunday the bells rang out to call the people to defend their religion. The crowd gathered in the Prado, but no one came forward to address them, though sacristans, &c., mixed with the crowd, urging on to 'vengeance on the Protestants.'

"About 2 p.m. we heard the roar of furious thousands, and like a river let loose they rushed down on our house. Paving stones were quickly torn up, and before the police arrived, windows and doors were smashed, and about one thousand voices were crying for blood. We cried to the Lord, not expecting to live much longer. The chief of police and his men were swept away before the mob, and the door burst in before the huge stones and force used. There were two parties, one for murder and one for robbery. I was beaten and dragged about through the patio, while the cry went up, 'Death to the Protestant!' The fire was blazing outside, as they had lots of kerosene, and with all the forms, chairs, texts, clothes, and books, the street was a bonfire. Piles, too, of Mrs. Hope's books and photos, goods, and everything they could lay hands on were taken.

"It seemed that the end had come, when a big Cholo Indian, who had been helped by me, drove back the savages by sheer force. One man rushed at me with a knife, but Terrazas knocked him down. Soldiers now arrived, striking terror into the hearts of the mob, as they simply charged through everything, and wielded swords on all sides.

"We were glad to find ourselves in life, the poor children escaping also. In a few minutes more we had a stream of sympathisers that lasted till night. During the night an attack was made on the Semenario, which they met with rifles and revolvers. About £150 to £200 damage has been done in our house. We are repairing as able, because we do not feel that we should accept damages from the authorities."

Society for the Relief of Distressed Widows.—This Society has now been in existence over seventy years, and has granted relief to some thousands of poor destitute widows, many of whom have borne testimony that the money given by the Society has enabled them to overcome the difficulties consequent on their bereavement, and thus to have opened a way to future livelihood, independently of parochial assistance. Lord Llangattock is president, and the secretary is Mr. Samuel Rayson, 32, Sackville Street, London, W.

A College Principal.

REV. CALEB SCOTT, D.D.

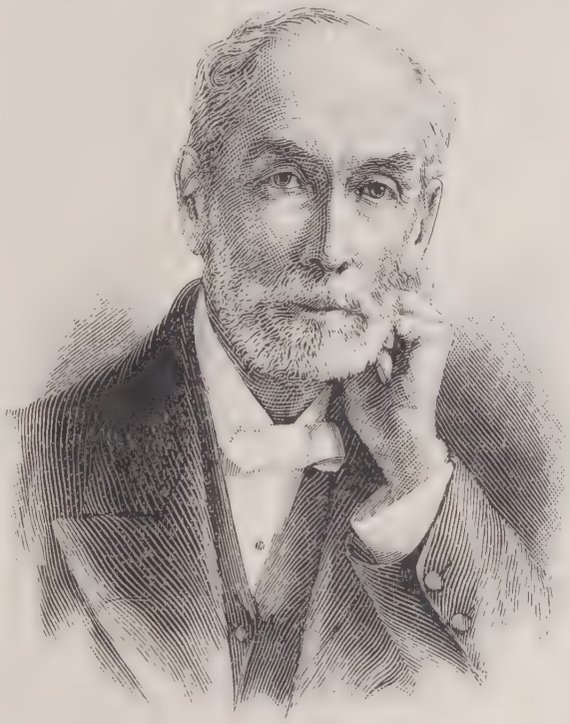
"THE generation of the righteous is blessed" is a saying well illustrated in the life of Dr. Caleb Scott, the retiring Principal of Lancashire Independent College, Manchester. His grandfather was a Northumberland shepherd; and in the early part of the last century, if not now, men of that class were often known for their intellectuality and godliness. Mrs. Josephine Butler, whose father had a farm under the shadow of the Cheviots, speaks of some who could read Virgil in the original, and the Greek New Testament. Whether Dr. Scott's grandfather could do this or not, he was a man of devout habits. At a certain season of the year it was his custom to bring his flock of sheep to a certain village, and remain for a few days. While there on one occasion he was observed by a boy to go away daily in the same direction into a small plantation and pray. The boy, afterwards a friend of the writer of this sketch, was the writer's informant. No doubt the shepherd was thus unconsciously helping to make one of the most beautiful Christians I have ever known.

His own son, Walter Scott, became an Independent minister, and settled at Rothwell, in Northamptonshire, having for his pastoral charge a church that had been through persecutions and sorrows for Christ's sake. Some notable men had preceded him. There Richard Davis had laboured—a man before his times in his intelligent conceptions of the use of lay agency in preaching. Before "county unions" were formed, or there was any talk of "grouping churches," before the Methodist plan of having a circuit was dreamt of, he had a circuit of work drawn around his church, and a band of lay preachers organized to serve it. Another notable man was Matthias Maurice, who wrote of "Social Religion Exemplified," and had great influence upon Independency at the end of the eighteenth century. One of the remarkable features of these small Independent Churches, formed some 250 years ago as the result of fidelity to conscience, and often cleansed by the fires of persecution, was that they influenced religious thought, both deeply and widely. One of them, formed by an expelled clergyman, became first a home of devout men and women, then a seat of learning where some of the most notable men of the day were taught and trained, and finally a prosperous church in the midst of a dense manufacturing population. In his quiet Northamptonshire charge Mr. Walter Scott found time to train some young men for the ministry. In this place his son Caleb was born some seventy years ago.

At the age of three Caleb was taken into Yorkshire, his father having been appointed President of Airedale College, Bradford, a position he held from 1834 till 1856. The son, who had early decided upon being a minister, received his education at Silcoates School, and also served some time in a business house for the sake of a business training. At eighteen he began in his father's college the serious work of a ministerial student; his intellectual course was brilliant, as he passed his B.A. and LL.B. examinations at the London University with first-class honours. His subsequent diploma of D.D. was conferred by the University of St. Andrews.

At the early age of twenty-three Mr. Scott became pastor of the Independent Church in Lincoln, a position which he held for eleven years, and in which he was very useful to many souls. His ministry there is still remembered with love and gratitude, and he himself remembers it with the kindliness generally felt for "a first sphere."

In 1865 Mr. Scott was invited to share some of the duties of the famous Henry Rogers, Principal of Lancashire Independent College, Manchester, and became Professor of New Testament Greek, Ecclesiastical History, and Mental and Moral Philosophy. Four years later Mr. Rogers retired, and Mr. Scott succeeded him in the Principalship. His term of office from 1869 to the present year has been marked by great improvements and enlargement of the college. The library has been increased, and students encouraged to seek the highest attainments for their work. While none of his students seem to have become men of the first rank and mark in their high calling, they will be found occupying useful and honourable positions in the home and foreign fields. It is to be remembered that the kind of students whom a tutor "turns out" depends upon the kind of student who "goes in": he cannot supply brains. And yet again it should be remembered that intellectual distinction and spiritual fitness are quite different things, and the combination of the two is rare. A tutor may have the happiness to receive a few men who have both; he may labour for a generation, and have to be content to work with ordinary material. He can only do the best for each man in his order.



REV. CALEB SCOTT, D.D.

From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, London, W.

It had been felt for some time that a college principal who had trained so many ministers, although he nad never taken a prominent part in public or church life, ought to be called to the highest honour his brethren could give him, and amongst Congregationalists that is the Chairmanship of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Accordinly, Dr. Scott's friends took steps to secure his election, and he was chosen for the post in 1902. But in the meantime his health had seriously failed, and it was doubted whether he would be able to fulfil any of his duties. In point of fact, he has never presided at any of the Union's meetings. His address last May, which was on the important subject of "Christ and Criticism," and had the happy sub-title of "The Open Mind and the Adoring Heart," was read to the assembly by a friend. Dr. Scott's health was so precarious that he lingered for a long time between life and death, and on one occasion some papers announced that his end had come. In October when he should, in the ordinary course, have given the autumnal address at Glasgow, he had been too prostrate to prepare anything, and was unable to come. Like many more he has come to his principal honour when he could not enjoy it; and much sympathy has been felt for him in his physical and spiritual trial, in not being able to discharge duties congenial to his mind.

The key to his address on "The Open Mind and the Adoring Heart" was given in the following words:—

> Especially let us not forget that these truths which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man, but which the Spirit of God has revealed. These truths no historical research, however profound, and no analysis of documents, however keen, can touch. Eternal life consists in knowing the only true God and His Son Jesus Christ. That life no question of books and their authors, of manuscripts and texts, can injure; no poisoned arrow or venomous tooth can destroy. Those truths are certainties which, come what may, cannot be shaken.

Our Railway Men.

OUR railway men are, as a class, so deservedly popular with travellers on account of the admirable way in which they discharge their onerous duties that any movement for their benefit must commend itself to all. The care which these men exercise in their work is strikingly illustrated by the fact that out of the 1,172,395,900 passengers who travelled last year, not a single person was killed. It is a sad fact, however, that during the same period 539 railway men were killed while at work on the line.

The object of the Railway Mission is the spiritual, moral, and social welfare of the 534,141 men employed on the railways of the United Kingdom, as well as those in our colonies and other places abroad.

It has just come of age, having been formed twenty-one years ago, and 400 branches have been formed, at which over 1,000 religious and temperance meetings are held every week for the men and their friends.

In addition to the home work, missionaries have been sent to India, Japan, and South Africa. The Cape Government Railway authorities grant the use of a coach in which the missionary travels from station to station on the lonely Karoo, conducting meetings and preaching the Gospel to the men, who in many cases, for months at a time, have no opportunity of attending a religious service.

Hundreds of men have been led to find in Jesus their Almighty Saviour, and are now witnessing brightly for Him among their mates. A foreman over a large number of men, who is himself an unconverted man, recently said, "The Railway Mission has made an alteration in this yard; the whole tone of the place is different." There are twelve Christian men in this department, where there was not one three years ago. The need for the work increases year by year, owing to the prevalence of Sunday work, which hinders many of the men from attending ordinary places of worship. The Mission seeks to reach these by arranging services at times and places which suit their convenience. Convalescent Homes have been established at St. Leonards and Southport, which accommodate about seventy patients. The secretary is Mr. R. Nixon, 1, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

Home Missions.

Workless London.

TO cope with the prevailing distress among the poor, exceptional efforts are being put forth just now by many philanthropic agencies. Among these the practical and effective labours of the Church Army to alleviate suffering hold a high and honourable place.

During the recent "cold snap," Rev. Wilson Carlile acted with characteristic promptitude in the interests of the homeless and starving. Soup Kitchens have been opened in several of the neediest districts, and a number of the Labour Homes utilized as temporary shelters. Beyond this, some of the tents generally used for evangelistic missions have been erected in convenient places, and these, comfortably warmed, admirably serve their purpose in sheltering the homeless. The accommodation at the Morning Post Home on the Embankment has also been extended, so that it is possible to receive in all some hundreds of men nightly at the various centres. Each comer is given soup and bread on entering and tea before leaving in the morning.

OUT O' WORK RESERVISTS.

In the course of a brief interview, Mr. Victor Carlile (who has spent many nights in ministering to the comfort of these distressed people) assured a representative of The Christian that the majority are decent men, honestly seeking work and unable to find it, while loafers are conspicuous by their absence. A considerable proportion are reservists returned from South Africa.

TENTS, AND EMPTY HOUSES.

"We do not believe in indiscriminate charity," added Mr. Carlile, "and it should be understood that these efforts are temporary, to meet what we hope is a temporary need, and are financed through a special fund. But the suffering is so great that immediate and liberal measures are necessary. One new method of coping with the misery is to obtain the use of empty houses, and to fit them up as shelters."

"And you have been successful in this?"

"I am happy to say," replied Mr. Carlile, "that the London County Council have kindly granted us the use of several, and it is hoped to secure more. It should be noted that in many cases the gratitude of the poor fellows who come under our care is most touching."

THE LABOUR HOMES.

The Army's Labour Homes are also filled with men who are being helped "out of the depths," but the calls for assistance and aid are many. In connection with his city church of St. Mary-at-Hill, Rev. Wilson Carlile has inaugurated a small "industrial department" in his rectory garden, where out-o'-works are provided with wood-chopping.

It is encouraging to note that while the deserving are thus practically helped, work among drunkards and criminals is actively maintained. A typical instance of fruitful effort in this direction may well be given in the words of a Home "Captain":—"F.G.B. for six weeks previous to entering our Home had not had a bed. He was in such a filthy condition that we had at once to destroy all his clothes. After being with us three months we got him a situation in a large furniture warehouse where he earns 30s. a week. He is still staying with us in the Lodging Home; and on being asked by one of the other men why he did not go into private lodgings nearer to his work, he replied, 'No, he would never forget the Church Army for what they had done for him; it raised him from the very lowest condition to a life of respectability.'"

The address of the Church Army Headquarters is 130, Edgware Road, W.

The Howard Association.

AMONG the improvements in prison administration indicated in the recent report of the Commissioners, the Committee of the Howard Association cordially welcomes the decision to institute more effective classification of prisoners, especially more thorough separation of young offenders from old and hardened criminals. Hope is expressed that the recommendation of the Commissioners in regard to the latter class will receive favourable attention from the Home Secretary. In reference to youthful offenders, especially those from sixteen to twenty-one years of age, technically known as "juvenile adults," the Committee awaits with much interest the scheme whereby a part of the convict prison at Borstal is to be set aside for the more reformatory treatment of such as come from the metropolitan district.

Dealing with the conditions of reformatory treatment in prisons, the importance is urged of securing the right sort of men and women for prison officers, and the desirability of making use of outside influences for good, such as visits by ministers and others, mission services by the Church Army and the Salvation Army, and the like.

The subject of prison industries has engaged attention, and we note with satisfaction the abolition in English prisons of the degrading labour of the treadwheel, and increasing evidence of the adoption of such industries as may be of use to the prisoner, developing his powers, physical, intellectual and moral. The Association has earnestly pressed the adoption of "Sloyd," or manual training by instruction in the use of tools; and also urges that, wherever it is possible, more efforts shall be made to employ prisoners in gardening and agriculture. The education of prisoners, by school lessons, lectures, and the provision of suitable libraries, is receiving more attention than formerly; but there appears to be room for further effort in this direction.

Passing to the causes of crime, an evil eminence is assigned to two factors closely interwoven with one another—bad housing and intemperance. At least ninety per cent. of the women are of the homeless "unfortunate" class, whose number beyond doubt increases with the growth of our town life. Drink is an adjunct of their terrible lives. Idleness, dementia, and sensuality are the root causes of their condition. Though many of them are convicted hundreds of times of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, it is clear that, in considering female intemperance, the convictions of these women should be attributed to the causes named, rather than directly to intemperance.

Numbers of these women have been convicted under the Habitual Inebriates Act of 1898, and have been committed to Inebriate Reformatories. The conduct of many of them in these institutions has been so bad that the managers have been compelled to discharge them. The committee are glad to note that the Home Office has at length established two State Inebriate Reformatories, to which such women, who have proved unmanageable in the philanthropic or County Council Reformatories, are now transferred, with the certainty of being detained and controlled for the full length of time for which they were committed.

Scripture Texts in 'Bus and Tramcar.—The continuous and systematic work being carried on by the London Tramcar and Omnibus Scripture Text Mission is being acknowledged on every hand as an agency deserving of wide support. It is calculated that at the present time there are 3,900 trams and omnibuses running daily, but of these only 550 are supplied with texts of Scripture. An offer from one much interested in the work has awakened considerable interest. A friend has promised to give £50 annually for increasing the number of texts if the income of the Mission can be raised to £500 beyond its receipts of last year. The amount is not yet forthcoming, but the committee are hopeful that they will be able to avail themselves of this exceptional opportunity of extending their operations. The secretary is Miss G. L. Baily, 27, Charterhouse Square, London, E.C.

English Navvies.

THERE is a decided spirit of inquiry and a readiness to hear amongst the navvies employed at several of the large public works in England. Those who have mixed with the men in the settlements have been witnesses of that most wonderful and mysterious working of God's Holy Spirit, whereby men here and there are suddenly broken down in conviction, and, finding themselves confronted by God, throw themselves as poor sinners at the feet of the One who came to seek and to save them that were lost. God has the navvy in his tender thoughts. Of one man, who lately received the glorious news of God's love, on his death-bed, it was remarked, "You could see from his face that he was entering into glory!"

There is a great demand for good, sound Gospel tracts and booklets; hundreds are daily given away, and are readily accepted, and always read. Groups of navvies at their morning or midday meal, may often be seen sitting reading tracts just given them, or, as some man slowly folds up his tract, and puts it in his pocket, the remark may be heard, "I'll read it to the missis to-night."

Parcels of tracts would be thankfully received, and all information respecting work amongst the navvies would be gladly given, by the secretary, Navvy Mission Society, Church House, Westminster, S.W.

Literature for Light-keepers.

THE distribution of Christian literature among the keepers of lighthouses around the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland has been continued through another year by Miss Holden Pike (Winchmore Hill, London, N.), under the supervision of the Council of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society. At Christmas an endeavour is made to send out an extra number of packets, the field being an exceedingly wide one, extending even to Canada and Australasia, those distant stations having received attention from time to time. The letters received from the men pleasantly show how heartily they appreciate what has been sent to them. While working on behalf of the Society just named, Miss Holden Pike has to collect funds for working expenses, the chief items of outlay being suitable, attractive reading and the postage, which is still more considerable.

Up to the present time the distribution has been so far successful that it deserves to be extended to the American Continent and to the Antipodes. The chief contributor has been the Hon. J. H. Angas, of South Australia, but many other well-known friends have contributed with proportionate liberality. A larger number of smaller contributions would more encouragingly testify to popular interest in the work. In the letters they have written from time to time the men have told many interesting things about their daily life, hardships, and even perils. The surroundings of many stations involve a constant strain on the nerves, through their exposure to waves and wind. Some of the keepers are earnest Christian men, thankful to know that someone thinks of them, while the appreciation of others is not less emphatic.

Billingsgate Christian Mission.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting on behalf of the Billingsgate Medical Mission was held on Friday last by kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Maynard, at St. Aubyns, Wimbledon. It was presided over by the Rev. E. W. Moore, of Emmanuel Church. Mr. Maynard warmly commended the work, having been associated with it for many years.

Addresses were also given by Mr. Williamson (treasurer), Mr. Walters (secretary), Dr. Stansfeld, and Miss Jack (one of the resident sisters). The need for a surgical ward was specially emphasised, where the more serious cases could be treated, and a better opportunity given for spiritual work, which is the primary object of the Mission. Friends would be welcome at any time, or a report would be sent on application to Mr. A. Walters, 19, St. Mary at Hill, E.C.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, December 28. 2 Kings xxiv.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S invasion of Judah was evidently at the direct impulse of Jehovah (v. 3). The Lord could not pardon because the heart of the nation was still set on sin (xxiii. 26; Jer. xv. 1). For further details of the sins and death of Jehoiachim, see Jeremiah xxii. 13, 19; xxxvi. 30.

Jehoiachin was untaught by the experience of his ancestors, and deaf to the warnings of Jeremiah. His character is described by Ezekiel (xix. 5-7). Within three months after his accession to the throne he formed a league with Egypt against Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar sent his generals to besiege Jerusalem, as Jeremiah had foretold (xxii. 18), and soon after he followed in person. Jehoiachin realized that resistance was hopeless, and went out to surrender to him, in the hope, probably, that he would be suffered to retain his throne as a vassal to the King of Babylon. Instead of this, he was sent, as God's prophet had foretold, as a captive to Babylon (Jer. xxii. 24), accompanied by the queen-mother, his generals, and the leading men of his court and kingdom. The palace and temple were ransacked, and the sacred vessels carried to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi. 7; Dan. i. 2).

In his stead Nebuchadnezzar appointed the third and youngest son of Josiah, changing his name to Zedekiah (the Righteousness of God). But fair as his name was, his heart was impenitent and rebellious; and he went back from his plighted word to the King of Babylon, incurring his just wrath, and plunging his hapless kingdom into the depths of degradation and despair. Thus was God's purpose of judgment fulfilled against His people; and the terror of their rejection was in proportion to the privileges conferred on them, and the opportunities they had misused. Yet, all the while, as with us, the Father's heart was yearning over His rebellious children.

MONDAY, December 29. 2 Kings xxv.

This third and last siege of Jerusalem lasted a year and a half. So long a resistance was due to the strength of the fortifications, on which the King confidently relied. The sufferings from the famine became excruciating (Lam. ii. 20, 22; iv. 9, 10; Ezek. v. 10), and at last the King and his men of war broke out by the way of the royal garden. They were pursued and brought back; Zedekiah's eyes were put out, and the most eminent of his servants were put to death.

Gedaliah was appointed governor, and it seemed as though he would inaugurate a time of prosperity for the poor people who were left to till the land. The prophet Jeremiah was associated with him, and many of the fugitive Jews gathered to his court (Jer. xl. 9-12). But all these brightening hopes were blighted by his dastardly assassination of Ishmael. The remainder of the story, including the disastrous flight to Egypt, is told by Jeremiah, who narrates the dark and dreadful experiences which befell the God-deserted remnant of the people.

It is a terrible story. We can hardly credit that it is the history of the land of David and Solomon, and of the chosen people. But the Word of God must stand. To the froward He will show Himself froward. He is always love; but as the same sun which melts wax will harden clay, so God's love, which is to the believing and loving soul a great peace and joy, is to those that refuse it the savour of death unto death.

TUESDAY, December 30. 1 Chron. i.

The Books of Chronicles were diaries or journals, probably compiled from the registers, which were kept by the royal scribes, of passing occurrences. In the Septuagint Version the name given to them signifies, "Things Omitted," because many things unnoticed in the earlier books are here recorded; some narratives are also greatly extended. The authorship is commonly ascribed to Ezra, whose leading object seems to have been to show the division of families and possessions before the captivity, with a view to the restoration of the same order on the return.

It is very remarkable to find that modern research is establishing the truth of these ancient lists of names, and the division of the world between these tribes. Indeed, the entire progress of investigation is to substantiate the allegations of these records. I was asked recently, by a seeker after truth, if she must accept the statements of these genealogies in order to salvation. Of course I answered, No. We are not saved by our belief in these or similar historical fragments which, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, have been interwoven into the texture of Scripture, but by our simple reliance on the Lord Jesus Christ. At the same time, when once the soul begins to realize its union with the Son of God, it turns with immense love and interest to this Book, accepting it in its entireness, and not surprised to find that research corroborates its statements.

Let us notice how the inspired chronicler narrows the view-point from which he regards mankind. First, the line is followed to Noah, all others being ignored. Then to Abraham, all others being set aside. Then, after a brief notice of Abraham's other branches, Ishmael (29), Keturah (32), and Esau (35), the way is clear to consider the sons of Israel (ii. 1). But we must not forget that God loved the world, and that Jesus was the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. While our attention is fixed only on the Jewish race, to God all are precious.

WEDNESDAY, December 31. 1 Chron. ii.

The sons of Judah are mentioned first, because from this tribe David, and finally, our Lord, were to spring.

Verse 3.—How the memory of a sin clings to a man!

Verse 6.—See 1 Kings iv. 31. The fame of their sagacity and acquirements had descended to the time of Solomon, and formed a standard of comparison for his wisdom. Jewish writers say that they were looked up to as prophets during the time of the Egyptian bondage.

Verse 7.—Achar means troubler.

Verse 22.—Jair had twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead, because though on his paternal side he came of Judah, on his maternal he belonged to Manasseh. He had been adopted into Manasseh, and was, therefore, able to hold property in that tribe.

Verse 34.—Jarha was doubtless a proselyte to the Hebrew faith before he married this Hebrew heiress.

These names appear amid the stream of unremarkable, or at least unremarked, personalities, that pass before us in this chapter. Each the centre of a life full of interest, passion, love, joy, hope; each pursuing his course for good or ill; each destined to appear before the throne of God. How little do we know the story of each leaf in the forest of existence, but here they lie all together, like the leaves of autumn woods, rustling under the foot of the passer-by. But we may be sure that, though indistinguishable to our notice, each was a distinct object of the thought and love of God. Soon we also shall be as uninteresting to the busy world as most of these are to us!

THURSDAY, January 1, 1903. 1 Chron. iii.

Here we are on the track of the Messiah, "the Seed of David." Diverted from all others, our thought is concentrated on the one royal line. This, of course, is also the line of the kings of Judah. Notice verse 17 (R.V.), "the sons of Jeconiah, the captive." He was to be written childless (Jer. xxii. 30), because his son did not succeed him on the throne; Salathiel or Shealtiel being born during his captivity in Babylon (Matt. i. 12). There seems to have been some slight disturbance of the text at this point, which will be adjusted by inserting verse 18 after verse 20, and altering the name Pedaiah (v. 19) to Salathiel.

The care with which the Hebrews kept these old registers makes us understand the deep significance of those constant references to the Book of Life with which the Bible abounds. How important that we should be able to prove our pedigree, and that there should be no doubt as to our acceptance as heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ! There is no doubt that faith in the Lord Jesus, which implies a living union with Him, is the one irreversible condition on which our sonship rests. To have come of a godly line of ancestors will not secure enrolment in that Book; but one simple look of faith to Jesus Christ will settle it for ever, for He hath said, "My sheep shall never perish," and "I will not blot out his name from the Book of Life." Rejoice, then, not that demons are subject to you, but that your names are written in heaven.

FRIDAY, January 2. 1 Chron. iv.

There are several interesting items in this list of names. First, the prayer of Jabez, whose fourfold request is a model for us all. In fact, we might well interweave it into our daily petitions. That God will bless us indeed; that He would grant unto us ever-enlarging scope in our ministry; that His hand might be ever with us; and that He would keep us from evil—surely these are requests of vital importance. And by granting them our Father will turn the most sorrowful life into joy.

Secondly, by inserting the second clause of verse 18, between Jalon and and she bare in verse 17, this interesting fact appears, that an Egyptian princess had married a descendant of Caleb. This marriage must have taken place in the wilderness, after the Egyptian girl had renounced idolatry and become a convert to the worship of the God of Israel. Amid all the exclusiveness of the Hebrew race, there were occasional cases of this intermixture with Gentiles, but Divinely approved only on the condition of their accepting the Hebrew faith.

Notice, thirdly, that the art of linen manufacture had been cultivated at a very early age, probably in Egypt (21). The potters were employed by the king for his own work (23). May we not ask that we should be permitted to dwell with our King for His work of moulding the character and lives of men!

Lastly, the tribe of Simeon seems to have been too indolent or cowardly to inherit all the land that was assigned to it by Joshua, and therefore it remained in the hands of the Canaanites until the days of David. How many of us are like this? We fail to appropriate our heritage in Christ, and are soon driven from our holdings (29-41). Let us rely on the Holy Spirit to make us possess our possessions.

SATURDAY, January 3. 1 Chron. v.

We have here the story of the Trans-Jordanic tribes. The historian explains why he had not dealt with the tribe of Reuben before, as might have been expected, since he was the firstborn. Judah had been dealt with first, because the Messiah was to spring from his line; but Joseph had really taken the honour and glory of the firstborn, in the stead of Reuben.

These tribes on the east of Jordan bore but little part in the public life of the nation, and were principally concerned with the labours of pastoral life. They had the right of pasturage over the vast country which extended between the Jordan and the Euphrates. But they were included in the genealogies of Israel, as is clear from verse 17.

The Hagarites were Ishmaelites, or, as we should call them, Arabs (Psa. lxxxiii. 6). In the days of Joshua there was a coalition on the part of the tribes for the dispossession of these wandering children of the desert. God was entreated on their behalf, and delivered them because they put their trust in Him. What a lesson there is for us here! We are defeated too often because we fail to put our trust in Him, who waits to give us the victory. When the war is of God, we may unhesitatingly count on His co-operation.

After such a testimony it is sad to read verses 25, 26. This was the first captivity, and from it they never returned; but there had been no need for it, save for their apostasy. Only those who trust in God are as Mount Zion, that cannot be removed. F. B. M.

About Christmas Presents.

IT is not easy to say anything new about Christmas; it is such a very old theme. Yet, as with some of your dolls or other toys, age becomes no blemish, but rather adds a charm to their possession. You will have a great many new presents, no doubt, but some of the old ones will still remain very precious in your affections.

I think we generally value those presents most of which we have never had any of the same sort before. To have several of one kind often brings some disappointment, even though we appreciate the kind thought that prompted the givers. There is a "sameness" about them, even though they may differ in some slight particulars from each other.

It would seem very strange, would it not, if parents and friends happened to give each child in a family the same sort of present, and it would seem almost impossible for each one to look upon it as "just what he (or she) wanted."

But in God's Christmas Gift to us, all these elements are found. We are each one differently constituted in taste, in temper, in circumstance, and yet His Present suits us all, and we may each find in His "Holy Child Jesus," just what we most need. He is the only One of the kind that it is possible for us to have; He is equally suited to young and old; and though it is two thousand years ago since He was given, yet those who have really received Him into their hearts never grow tired of Him. Every day they live they find in Him something fresh to love and admire, and He is a daily source of comfort and of joy.

I see children sometimes who carry a new present about with them all day, and take it to bed with them at night; they seem never to let it out of their sight, except when they are asleep, and even then they keep it cuddled up in their arms or close by their side. A tiny girl of my acquaintance came into her father's study while he was hard at work, and sat down as quiet as a little mouse. Presently, her father asked her, "What have you come in for, Doris?" "Only to be with you, Dada!" she replied. "And why do you want to be with me, dear?" "Because you love me, and I love you!" was her pretty answer. That is just what Jesus desires to be to us, a constant companion in whom we can always find delight.

You may often get tired of a gift, but you never look upon it as a nuisance or an annoyance; but I have sometimes seen boys and girls look very uncomfortable, and even cross, when they are spoken to about Jesus, or asked to think about Him. That is not a kind or a reasonable way to treat Him, is it, when He has done so much to win your love! I daresay you have often thought how inconsiderate it was of the innkeeper to refuse Mary and her lovely Babe admittance to his house, and send them to an outhouse and a manger; and how inexcusable it was of the Samaritans to shut the gates of their city against Him, when He came to them weary and faint late at night; and how cruel it was of the Jews to put Him to death upon the cross. But none of them realized what they were doing in treating Him so. And yet have you not been inconsiderate, or inexcusable, or cruel to Him, when you have turned your back upon Him and refused Him a place in your heart?

If you were to refuse a present that some kind friend brought you, how hurt that friend would feel, though the gift itself would not feel it. But both God, the Giver, and Jesus, His precious Gift, are grieved when you refuse to receive Him.

We are apt to think most of those presents which are the most valuable, or which have cost the most money. We are told that we are "redeemed with the precious blood of Christ," which is precious for what it cost the Father, precious for what it cost the Son, and precious for what it is worth to us; so we ought to value Him far above every other gift that we possess.

Sometimes at Christmas we may receive something that is only of use in the winter, like a football or a pair of skates, and in a very short time we have to lay them by until winter comes again. Or, we may have something which we cannot use much till the spring or summer time, like a bicycle or a cricket bat. But Jesus is a gift that God has given us for use all the year round, in all sorts of weather, in holidays or at school. There is no season in which we may not enjoy Him all day and every day.

Lastly, when we have a valuable present, we are very proud of it, and like to show it to our companions, and boast about it, until they are quite envious of our good fortune. If you are a Christian, have you ever spoken about Jesus to your friends in such a way as to make them wish they had Him for their Saviour and Friend? Do you so glorify Him in your daily life that they can see you have got something they would like to have? That is what being a Christian means—letting your light so shine that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father which is in heaven.

If you have not already done so, will you not receive Him—God's unspeakable Gift—as your Saviour, Friend and Guide, and then so confess Him before others that they will want Him too?

When Jesus has found you, tell others the story
That my loving Saviour is your Saviour too;
Then pray that your Saviour may bring them to glory,
And prayer will be answered—'twas answered for you.

That is the only way, boys and girls, to have the really happy Christmas that I would wish you, and a bright and useful life.

Uncle Tom.

A Christmas Message.

I.

"For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord" (Luke ii. 11).

"Unto you is born a Saviour
In the city of the King!"
Suddenly a host of angels
Make the heavens with music ring.

Blessing God for all His goodness
To His children on the earth,
Came the pure and holy angels,
Singing of the Saviour's birth.

Bowing low in adoration
At the sound of Jesu's name,
We unite with them in praising—
We for whom the Saviour came.

II.

"He shall save His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21).

In the glorious sunrise
Of that blessèd day,
When the holy angels
Sang their matchless lay,

We behold the dawning
Of a clearer light,
When from God's creation
Sin shall take its flight.

Jesus came and conquered
Satan, sin, and wrong:
Unto Him our praises
And our lives belong!

Our Christmas Prize.

Who among our many children
Will most Christmas smiles obtain,
Sunlight to their households bringing,
Rays of light around them flinging,
Causing happiness to reign?

Who will render—self forgetting—
Willing service all around;
Cheerfulness o'er all diffusing,
Every kindly effort using,
Loving, joyous helpers found?

Yielding to all others pleasure,
Self-denying, it may be;
Every sweet attention showing,
Every generous aid bestowing,
From all ostentation free?

Strong to help the weak and friendless,
Where most needed, there most near;
Easing every load of sorrow,
Gilding each succeeding morrow,
Staying every rising tear?

Such are sowing seed for harvest,
Using love's suggestive wiles;
Such, the Christmas prize obtaining,
Shall rewarded be in gaining
Wreaths of true and loving smiles.

PAUL AND SILAS AT PHILIPPI (Acts xvi. 23-34).

GOLDEN TEXT.—Acts xvi. 31.

A GLAD NEW YEAR dawned on Europe when "the Dayspring from on high" visited that Continent, and "the Sun of Righteousness arose with healing in His wings." "The Light of the world is Jesus," and His messengers were ready and eager to carry "the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ" to those who walked in darkness (John viii. 12). Paul, Silas, Timothy, and Luke, guided by the triple token of "the Spirit of Jesus" (v. 7, R.V.), the vision of Macedonia, and their own combined judgment (v. 10), planted the first banner of the Cross on European soil in the spring of A.D. 50, during Paul's second missionary tour.

The first days at Philippi were spent "waiting upon God" at the place "where prayer was wont to be made" (v. 13), and whence doubtless the cry for help had gone up to the Lord. Lydia, the first recorded convert in Europe, and her household were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. No public preaching is mentioned other than v. 13.

(1) Prayer, united, daily, constant (v. 16).

(2) Spirit of opposition roused. Evil spirit in the girl, "love of money" in her masters, and party spirit among the Roman officials.

(3) Violent and cruel persecution.

(4) Answers to prayer. Joy and exceeding gladness in their affliction (Matt. v. 12). The prison doors opened, and the bands of the prisoners loosed. The gaoler saved by believing in Jesus.

Verse 19: "The love of money is the root of all evil" (1 Tim. vi. 10). The bitter fruit appeared in the wicked, violent, spiteful, and revengeful spirit of the owners of the poor girl, out of whom the evil spirit had been mercifully driven. Masters, multitudes, magistrates, and even the gaoler seemed to join hands (Pro. xi. 21) in devising torture for the persecuted apostles. "Evil with both hands, earnestly" (Micah vii. 3). Underground, inner dungeon, utter darkness, hot and loathsome. Sore from the strokes (2 Cor. xi. 25), hungry (Phil. iv. 12), feet in the stocks, but their spirits were free to pray, and God fulfilled His promise to them (Eze. xi. 16).

"I will be to them a little sanctuary." The prisoners heard the praise of the Lord sung first in a prison, and by fellow-prisoners.

(only) God can keep a heart in tune
'Mid life's discords even.

Job xxxv. 10, "Songs in the night" is rare music, but it glorifies the Lord.

"Suddenly there was a great earthquake (v. 26). What were wooden doors and iron bars, or strong bands, to God? "He overturneth the mountains by the roots" (Job xxviii. 9). "And the rocks rent." When? (Matt. xxvii. 51.)

THE GAOLER OF PHILIPPI.

Cruel, terrified, trembling, learning, believing, rejoicing, grateful, and willing to witness for Jesus.

Verse 30. Vital question. Each soul needs a Saviour (none too young), but will not seek Him until they see their need. He was told not to do anything. Doing (v. 32-34) followed faith as fruit follows life.

THE VOICE OF DUTY.

A handsome memorial is being erected in Caistor churchyard over the graves of the Norfolk lifeboat heroes who were recently drowned. Upon the stone will be chiselled, "Caistor men never turn back," words uttered by a veteran boatman at the inquest held after the disaster. The nine noble men who sacrificed their lives would not turn from their duty, whatever the dangers ahead, and the Apostles, by remaining at Philippi, after curing the damsel, braved the storms of an infuriated town. To have turned and fled would doubtless have been easy; to remain and suffer the indignities of stripes was their duty. There come times in the lives of us all when the call of duty must be obeyed, when the voice of God is heard: "This is the way, walk ye in it."

EVERYDAY FAITH.

A London signalman was speaking the other day of the importance of his duties in controlling the railway traffic of the metropolis. He expressed surprise at the unbounded faith of the travelling public. "If," said he, "a man could spend a day in one of our important signal-boxes, and watch the intricate working of the levers which control the points, I doubt if he would ever venture again in a train crossing some of our railway junctions." The fact is, many travelling folk are every day putting their faith in their fellows with regard to the affairs of this world; and usually their faith is justified. The same people will not trust the Lord at all in the affairs of their souls. A man "only believes" in the power of human beings when he travels by road, rail, or underground; he "only believes" in many business and domestic doings. Yet when the soul cries, "What must I do to be saved?" the same man will not believe that through the Saviour there is redemption, preservation, and an abundant entrance into heaven.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

THE WAY HOME (John xiv. 1-6; Rev. xxi. 1-4).

HOWEVER long the road and difficult to the foot, it will at last end in Home. The sea may be full of trouble, with its long, grey, heaving swell, on the foam of its crested breakers, but at last the harbour-lights of Home will beckon across the dark waters, and we shall leave our tossing ship for the welcome of those whom we love, and who were waiting for us.

When we get home, we shall find that our special natures have been prepared for. There is no monotony there, but "many mansions." Each child of the Father will find that special thought has been expended by his Saviour in adapting him for his mansion, and the mansion for him. When a mother is expecting her boys and girls home for Christmas, she decks their rooms with reference to their tastes. She remembers that James loves the dried autumn leaves, while Mary prefers the edelweiss with its memories of the upper Alps. And she prepares for each. This is the very pride of love, to remember and adapt. It is as though it said, "I have not forgotten what you love best; see here it is." Yes, our Lord knows us better than we know ourselves; and what will give us the most exquisite joy, when we get home, never to go out again, because the work is done, and the lesson learnt. We cannot help being a little homesick as we think of it.

It is good also to know that we shall not have to tread the dreaded way of death alone. Jesus will come again to meet us, and take us home, that where He is we may be also. He is no doubt with us now, watching every step, but when all mortal things fade before our dimming eyes His figure will appear, coming to meet us. Do you know where Heaven is? He said, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know"; and then He said, "I go to the Father," and "No man can come unto the Father but by Me." Is it not clear that Heaven is the Father's heart, and therefore is not far away? "That where I am, there ye may be also."

Turning from the Gospel to the Apocalypse, we discover that Heaven is to descend to earth and fill it with its aroma and beauty. John saw the holy city descending out of heaven from God, and the essence of its glory is that God is descending also to make His home with man; and when He comes, He will make all things new. Before Him sorrow and sighing, pain and death, division and separation, will pass away for ever. What is meant by that saying, that the sea shall be no more, except that all which is restless and troubled, all storms and turbulence, all that separates and divides shall be at an end for ever?

As the new year comes, shall we not go forth to wipe away tears, to alleviate pain, to mitigate the anguish of the world, pouring into its wounds the oil and wine of Christian love. Let us help to prepare for the descent of the New Jerusalem, that the socket may be ready to receive its foundations. F. B. M.

From Our Readers.

"THE OUTPOURED SPIRIT."

DEAR SIR,—Some of your readers may, like myself, be perplexed in regard to the subject of prayer for the outpouring of the Spirit.

In a recent article it was stated that as the Holy Ghost was outpoured at Pentecost, and had never ceased to be outpoured, such a petition as "Pour out Thy Spirit upon all flesh" was a misapprehension of the truth. But may it not be possible to hold firmly to the fact of the Holy Spirit's having been given as the great bequest to the Church; the flowing of the river of life earthwards, and yet to pray for a fuller outpouring of the living waters; showers of blessing that will, so to speak, cause the river to overflow its banks, and bring fruitfulness, not only to the cultivated lands along the margin of its usual course, but far out into the desert wastes.

The Holy Spirit cannot be poured out except on believers, some say; how then did they become believers but through His converting power? and on the day of Pentecost was it not the outpouring that made the 3,000 believers?

We know not what to pray for as we ought, and thank God. He who searches the heart, and sees the great desire that His work should revive, answers according to the mind of the Spirit, and not to our feeble and imperfect words. Nevertheless, some of us would be glad to think that Scripture does warrant this petition, and the symbols of air, and light, and water suggest an outflowing that may rise and fall, yea, pass over all bounds as floods upon the dry ground, and rain outpoured from the window of heaven—upon all flesh.

INQUIRER.

DEAR SIR,—I am very thankful for the article signed "M.," which appeared in your issue of the 4th inst., on the gift of the Holy Spirit. But I would like to ask, do the terms "pour out" and "poured out" belong to the Church now? I do not, I think, find the gift of the Holy Spirit so expressed after Peter's vision and its solution in Acts x. Throughout the Epistles, and in our Lord's reiterated promise to send the Comforter, the Holy Spirit is presented as a Person, indwelling in believers—the temples of the Holy Spirit. And we are admonished to be filled with the Spirit in entire surrender to His control, to the ignoring of every human source of power or joy.

The word "drink into one spirit" (R.V.) is not to be understood to mean imbibing the Person, but just as we use the word of any influence which the mind of one person may exert over another. The expression "pour out" was anterior, and will be ulterior to the Church's history on earth. It belongs to another dispensation. Our Lord makes the distinction in the last clause of John xiv. 14-17—"dwelleth with you and shall be in you." He has come to take up his abode in believers, and will go away with us at our being caught up to meet our Lord.

The descent of the Holy Spirit in person to lead and conduct the Church—dwelling in believers "till He be taken out of the way," is an accomplished fact. He is to abide with us; therefore it is a mistake to take up the Old Testament ground, and to pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit as at Pentecost.

According to Joel's prophecy "the former rain" has been given "moderately," but Israel still rejected God's Christ, their Messiah, in the murder of Stephen.

God will cause to come down the latter rain, as verse 28. "It shall come to pass afterward." God will complete Joel's prophecy; but the action of the Holy Spirit will be of a different character from His work now at the present time. Then it will be poured on, not dwelling in, believers.—Yours faithfully, H. C. P.

Mrs. Karl Kumm, in ministering to many needy ones, will be glad of gifts of "half-worn clothes of any sort, and especially of warm things such as blankets." Mrs. Kumm's address is Cliff College, Calver, via Sheffield.

In connection with the Jewish Presbyterian Mission, Whitechapel, E., a small work depôt is being opened in connection with the Jewish Mothers' Meeting. Miss FORSYTHE, 57, Ladbroke Grove, W., writes:—"We should be thankful for orders for garments for charitable purposes."

Mrs. C. H. CONNOR, Chelsea Children's Mission, 25, Church Street, S.W., writes:—"Our needs are greater this year, as so many of the parents are out of employment, the children suffering in consequence. Funds are asked to provide meals, and gifts of left-off clothing are also sought."

Writing on behalf of the Female Orphan Home, Tangley Park, Hampton, Mr. D. J. COOPER (secretary) says:—"I know Christian people will remember the poor in the streets, but there are other poor, gathered in from the outside cold. Shall they not also be fed?" Office, 79, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

Mr. J. F. SPRIGGS, 1, Hollingbourne Road, Herne Hill, S.E., appealing for the Orchard Mission, Peckham, S.E., writes:—"The 'Orchard,' Peckham, has nothing inviting about it but its name, but the Mission there has many brave and willing workers who are determined that, if funds are forthcoming, there shall be comforts for the sick, boots and other needed clothing for the destitute, and fare for the hungry little ones."

Rev. JAMES WATKIN, of Surrey Chapel, S.E., writes (from 7, Albert Square, Clapham Road, S.W.) asking "for help to feed and cheer our poor children of Blackfriars." Mr. Watkin adds:—"We are anxious also to send medical comforts to the aged and sick poor, to help the widow and fatherless in their distress, and to render some assistance to the crippled children of our district. Blankets, boots, old clothes, and hospital tickets are much needed."

Sir MARK J. MCTAGGART STEWART, M.P., urges the claims of the Children's Aid Society, "knowing its good work, and having been associated with it for over forty years; but while I have watched its progress with the greatest satisfaction, I feel that much work still remains to be done. The committee deal with a thousand fresh cases of poor neglected children every year." Address: The Secretary, Children's Aid Society, 32, Charing Cross, S.W.

The committee of Hampton's Mission for the Blind are endeavouring to raise a sum of £500 to meet the necessary expenditure during 1903, in order that, removed from present anxieties and pressing necessities, they may be free to devote their whole energies to the building of a Mission Hall and Home of Rest for blind toilers. The present Mission Hall is only held at a weekly tenancy, and is sadly inadequate for the ever-increasing needs of the blind members. Address, Hon. Secretary, Hampton's Mission for the Blind, Westminster Bridge Road, S.W.

Rev. B. J. GIBBON, of Bloomsbury Chapel, writes from 61, Adelaide Road, N.W.:—"Could you include among your appeals, one for the Baptist Deaconesses' Institute, 98, Guildford Street, W.C.? This is the residence of the Sisters, but the mission carried on by them is among the poor and destitute, young and old, in Leather Lane, where they have a hall. I am on the committee; and the other members, with myself, would be very grateful if your readers will help this very deserving work?"

Rev. THOMAS JACKSON writes from 279, Whitechapel Road, E.:—"The distress and poverty with which my helpers and I are brought in contact in this neighbourhood is heartbreaking. Our evangelistic, medical, and philanthropic agencies are ministering to hundreds of necessitous and starving families. What grieves me is that our funds at this critical time are overdrawn to the extent of £400. Will your generous readers come to our assistance in rescuing the perishing and saving the lost?"

At the Lamb and Flag Ragged Schools, Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell, E.C., about 600 hot meat dinners are being provided every week to the poorest children, and soup at ½d. per quart to the poorest families. "There are many indications that the coming winter is to be a trying one for the poor; we therefore ask your kind co-operation in our efforts to make provision for those who are likely to be destitute. Every case helped is investigated by our city missionary." Address: Mr. T. B. GIFFEN, hon. secretary, as above.

"I hope to gladden many by gifts of meat, groceries, &c." writes Mr. T. G. YOUNG, superintendent of the Working Men's Mission, 7, Collingwood Street, New Cut, S.E. Last winter 100,000 persons were relieved in one way or another by the mission. A Christmas tree will be given to 1,400 children early in January next, if funds permit. Our soup kitchen was a real boon to the poor during the late severe weather. Help is greatly needed to assist the poor out-of-work people. Address: Messrs, T. and J. Young, 33, Nelson Square, Blackfriars Road, S.E.

Prebendary H. W. WEBB-PEPLOE (25, Onslow Gardens, S.W.) writes:—"May I crave a corner in your columns to plead on behalf of the Barbican Mission to the Jews for a small share in the gifts of the charitable at this Christmas season? The Mission has its headquarters in Whitechapel Road, and is doing a good work. In the course of the year it administers a substantial sum in the relief of distress—for many of the Jews are very poor—and with the prospect of a hard winter before us, the demands upon its resources will be greater than ever. Contributions may be sent to the Prebendary, or to the secretary, Prediger C. T. Lipshytz, 82, Whitechapel Road, E."

The Maternity Charity and District Nurses' Home, Plaistow, East Ham, and Victoria Docks, E., has for fourteen years past provided for the sick and suffering poor skilled nursing in their own homes, without which many valuable lives must have been lost. Last year over 6,000 patients were nursed by the staff of eighty, and close on 2,000 more were treated at the Homes as out-patients. "The Charity has no endowment or secured income, and is dependent for over £3,000 annually on voluntary contributions in order to maintain the ever-increasing work in a state of efficiency." Colonel Robert Williams, M.P., is treasurer, and the organizing secretary is Mr. F. JAMES, Howard's Road, Plaistow, E.

Rev. JOSEPH JOHNSON, superintendent of the South-East London Mission, St. George's Hall, Old Kent Road, is anxious to minister to the needs of the poor in the slums of South-East London. Nursing sisters are helping the sick and destitute, but funds are urgently needed for making their ministry more complete. Meals are provided for hungry children, and, in anticipation of financial aid forthcoming, extensive preparations are in progress for treats for waif children, cripples, and aged people. More than 10,000 visits have been made by the sisters and workers of the Mission into the slum homes of the vicinity during the year. The Mission seeks to uplift men by leading them to the Lord Jesus Christ.

"In School and Playground."—The president of the Free Church National Council (Rev. Dr. W. J. Townsend) writes:—"I have been delighted with the ease, naturalness, and homeliness of the book. It is full of the bright, free, attractive style which young people rejoice in. The illustrative parables and similes will cause it to be widely read."

The Jewish and English Almanack for 1903 (5663-4), compiled by Henry Barnett, includes such useful features as have made its predecessors so welcome for distribution among Jews. The Almanack is a neat penny booklet, with Hebrew excerpts from Holy Scripture and daily texts in English on alternate pages. Terms for quantities may be had from Mr Barnett, 94, Malmesbury Road, Bow, E.

Evangelists at Work.

(Every child of God may find a useful service in remembering in prayer the evangelists and hearers referred to on this page, from week to week. Thus is Revival spread.)

Temperance Mission at Aberdeen.

GREAT blessing continues to attend the Temperance Crusade at Aberdeen which is being prosecuted with such vigour by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. For twelve Lord's Days in succession the spacious Palace Theatre has been filled to overflowing with immense and interested audiences. The services on Lord's Day week were the first of a new series, the local committee having taken for a period the Alhambra Music Hall for the purpose of holding week night meetings. The speakers were Mr. JOHN H. ROBERTS, the well-known Welsh speaker, and Mr. BOB JOHNSON, "the converted minstrel," both of whom created a most favourable impression upon the immense audiences that thronged the buildings. Great results are confidently looked for. R.

Worcester Methodists.

A large new church has been erected at Worcester by the Wesleyan Methodists, on the site of the old Pump Street Chapel, and the friends have been working unitedly and praying earnestly for spiritual blessing on the new sanctuary. Here, Rev. E. DAVIDSON recently held a ten days' mission. The city was mapped out into districts, and every house visited twice. A "buttonhole brigade" proved very successful in securing the attendance of the street population, and a number were converted who were seldom, if ever, seen inside a place of worship. Another special feature was a visitation of the publichouses on Saturday afternoon by ladies. On the Sunday afternoon Mr. Davidson addressed a splendid audience of men. Several publicans were present, with their customers. It was a most powerful service, and proved to be the turning point of the mission. From this service to the end, the meetings were very encouraging, large numbers readily responding to the evangelist's appeals. It proved to be one of the mos blessed times in the history of Worcester Methodism.

A Children's and Young People's Mission.

Mr. SPIERS, founder of the Children's Special Service Mission, has just concluded a fortnight's special services for children and young people at Newport, Mon. The meetings were held in the large hall of the Y.M.C.A., kindly lent by the committee. The attendance was good throughout, and much blessing has come into many young hearts, who, getting a revelation of themselves under the power of the Spirit-guided message of the speaker, were led intelligently to make a surrender to the Saviour. United services were held in two of the largest chapels of the town on the first and second Sundays, and on the third in St. Paul's Church, which was well filled. Mr. Spiers visited Newport exactly eighteen years ago, and, as the result of his mission, two weekly Bible classes were started at the Y.M.C.A. rooms for girls and boys, both of which have been carried on during that period. It was a source of gratification to the missioner to meet with men and women now grown up, who are steadfastly following the Lord, who gave themselves to the Saviour at that first mission in 1884.

CHARLES E. COMPTON.

Mealsgate, Cumberland.

Mr. R. MCLEAN, of the Evangelization Society, has concluded his second visit during the present year to the George Moor Memorial Hall, Mealsgate, Cumberland. Never in twenty years' experience have we had so many waiting to the after meetings. Even when the service was closed the people were reluctant to leave. Another feature has been the great revival of Bible reading among the people, especially after the second Sunday, when the evangelist gave a powerful address on "A Morning Without a Night, and a Night Without a Morning." Christians have been helped and blessed, and quite a number of the unconverted were led to Christ, among them being husbands and wives, while children of praying parents have been brought to decision. We are thankful to God for sending His servant back to us with such a heart-searching course of addresses. Mr. McLean preached each Sunday morning in the Primitive Methodist Church, at Torpenhow Mission Room in the afternoon, and at all the places the Lord was present in power. An encouraging feature of the work was that all who decided for Christ at the former mission, in March, are standing firm, and have been present at all the meetings.

JOHN LIGHTFOOT, President of Mission.

Mr. H. Stafford Smith at Manchester.

The recent services held by Mr. SMITH in the Upper Moss Lane Mission, having been attended with such happy results, arrangements were made for a series of fifteen days' services at the Oxford Street Mission Hall, Old Trafford, both these halls being under the "Manchester and District Congregational Board."

These services have just come to a close, and have been eminently successful in spiritual results. The workers especially have been greatly blessed and encouraged, Mr. Smith's visit occurring at rather a critical period in the history of the Mission, when just such encouragement was needed. Mr. Smith conducted the meetings in his usual earnest and impressive manner, and all were sorry when the services were ended. In connection with this cause we have a splendid body of young men, who are full of zeal for the Master's cause, and who do a good work in the way of holding outdoor meetings. As an instance of the forcible nature of Mr. Smith's speaking, it may be mentioned that two of these young men decided to offer themselves for foreign mission work.

The children, too, were delighted with their special meetings, and gave practical demonstration of Mr. Smith's effective teaching at a crowded meeting on the Sunday afternoon. H. F. DORRINGTON.

A correspondent writes: "Mr. JAMES WHARTON has closed a happy mission at Enfield, North Carolina, U.S.A. Thirty-two students were brought to the Lord, and several ontsiders were reached, including one old lady, nearly 100 years of age, 'who got very happy when she felt the burden of her sins gone.'"

An encouraging mission was held in Horeb Baptist Church, Nantymoel, December 8-14, conducted by Rev. A. T. JONES, of Newport, Mon. This was the second mission conducted by Mr. Jones at the same place. As the result of the last series of services, held last December, about eighty have joined the church during the year.

Rev. EDGAR WILLIAMS, who recently conducted evangelistic services in this country with much acceptance, has arrived home at Peoria, Ill., U.S.A., where he addressed a large audience at a Lord's Day afternoon meeting for men in the Main Street Theatre, under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. Mr. Williams gave a striking address on "Character Building."

Mr. WILLIAM FORBES had a tea meeting for theatrical women, on Thursday week, at Orange Street Chapel, Leicester Square, when addresses were given by Miss Rose and Mr. H. E. Millar. As a large number of young women are now engaged for the provincial pantomimes, Mr. Forbes will be glad to hear from friends who may be willing to take an interest in them. His address is 71, Tollington Road, N.

On Saturday and Sunday, December 6 and 7, under the auspices of the Croydon Blue Ribbon Gospel Temperance Union, Mr. WILLIAM COLLARD, the Sailor Evangelist, conducted services in the Temperance Hall, Croydon, which proved of much blessing to those present. Mr. Collard spoke with power to the unsaved. Several went into the inquiry room at the close of the evening meeting, and all present felt it was a heart-stirring time.

E. R. REEP, hon. secretary.

Messrs. BASS and MCNEILL, of the Friends' Home Mission, have just concluded a five weeks' mission at Tandragee, Co. Armagh, which was attended with blessing. The meetings were largely attended after the first week, and many who hitherto had "cared for none of these things," have "chosen the better part" and yielded to the Saviour's claims, while some, who are older in the faith, speak of having received spiritual help. For this time of quickening we are praiseful to God. N. M. W.

Describing the mission of Rev. JAMES LYALL, at Dunedin, New Zealand, The Outlook says:—"It is gratifying to note the good work which has been accomplished, resulting in at least 200 adults signifying their acceptance of Christ during the week. The attendance at the meetings has increased nightly, until the Garrison Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity." Three meetings were held daily—a prayer meeting in the morning, Bible-reading at three, and an evangelistic service in the evening. No fewer than 500 people attended one of the afternoon meetings.

The Baptist Church at Corsley, Wilts., had a visit from Rev. JAMES SPRUNT, who conducted a fifteen-days' mission. The attendances were encouraging throughout, notwithstanding extremely cold weather. Every night seemed to increase the interest and enthusiasm, as well as the attendance. Mr. Sprunt delivered two lectures on "Bunyan and his Book," illustrated with lantern views. On these occasions we had crowded congregations. We are rejoicing over several young men and women who have given themselves to Christ and His service. This is the second mission Mr. Sprunt has conducted for us this year, but his messages lacked none of their former interest; they showed a powerful grip of God's Word, and were bright and fresh throughout. We have been greatly cheered and helped, too, by his effective singing.

A six days' mission has been conducted by Mr. HENRY THORNE, in New Road Congregational Church, Bury, Lancs. (minister, Rev. B. G. Theobald) under the auspices of the P.S.A. Except on Sunday afternoon, the congregations have not been large, but Mr. Thorne's addresses and Bible-readings have made a deep impression. While wholly free from sensationalism, they have made powerful appeal to the conscience, and reason, and heart. A substantial list of the names and addresses of those who have been moved to lead a Christian life, records the immediate fruitage of the mission, and the Council is devising means for the careful husbanding of this harvest. An invigorating influence has also been exerted upon the workers in the P.S.A. Mr. Thorne concluded the mission on Thursday evening, December 11, with his racy and inspiring lecture, "From the Stage to the Cross"—the story of his life. T.

An evangelistic campaign was recently conducted in the Baptist Church, Motherwell, N.B., by Mr. JAMES MURRAY, JUN. The mission was the outcome of a week of prayer by the church. Two weeks were at first agreed upon, but as the interest deepened it was deemed advisable to continue the effort, and the results justified that decision. On Sabbath evenings, the church was filled to its utmost capacity. Mr. Murray's clear expositions of evangelical truth and earnest appeals made a deep impression on his hearers, about sixty professing to decide for Christ, while many who had grown indifferent have been restored. A pleasing feature of the work was the brotherly feeling shown by God's people in the town by their hearty co-operation in the mission, as well as the help of several Gospel singers from Glasgow, which in no small degree contributed towards its effectiveness. The pastor and members of the church are filled with gratitude to God for the visit of Mr. Murray, and for the season of blessing enjoyed.

Unhappy Spain.—To the student of history familiar with the underlying causes of the decadence of the European and other races subjected to the enervating and soul-destroying influence of Romanism, the gradual sinking of Spain into her present Slough of Despond is in no way surprising. One fact alone goes far to explain the present condition of things. There are to-day in the country no fewer than 100,000 monks and nuns, with over 1,500 Jesuits; the last census showing that their numbers have quintupled in the last quarter of a century. As the great teaching body of the majority of the youthful population, their influence is that of leading away from the light and of destroying all desire for freedom.

Women's Protestant Union.—The St. Pancras Branch of the Women's Protestant Union held a successful drawing-room meeting at the residence of Sir Peter Spokes, Chester Terrace, Regent's Park, recently. Rev. F. S. Webster presided, and Mrs. Jennings and Mr. J. W. Flower also gave addresses. At the present time the Union stands in great need of funds for the maintenance and further extension of the work. The secretary, Mr. G. W. L. Barraclough, may be addressed at 19 and 20, Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

WORCESTER.

DESCRIBING the campaign of Dr. J. Q. A. Henry and Mr. T. Armon Jones, att Worcester, an esteemed correspondent writes:—"The visit has been a greall 'lift' to all Temperance workers and wie greatly tend to the unification of Temperancd Reform in the community. The mission opene with a young people's demonstration repref senting seventeen different Bands of Hope o children over eight years of age. On the Sabbath following the afternoon meeting for men and women was well attended, and at eight o'clock the body of the hall was full. Each successive night manifested the spread of interest as the numbers increased steadily, and the rich and powerful voice of Mr. T. Armon Jones greatly helped to draw to the meeting many who might not otherwise have been induced to come.

"Considering the spirit of indifferentism prevalent in the city towards temperance work the Mission has proved to be a very great success, and it has been said by those who have been in the work for upwards of forty years that no previous mission has been so conducive in rallying temperance people and bringing within the realm of total abstinence those who have long been merely onlookers. The men's meeting on the second Sabbath afternoon was the most impressive of all held, some 600 of the artisan class being present. Dr. Henry's address on that occasion was most impressive, and the enthusiasm among the men was the best indication of their appreciation. That same evening the hall was crowded. A feature of the Mission was its representative character, the leaders of the various Churches' Temperance Societies uniting to make it a success. Over 270 pledges were taken, representing all classes of the community. The people's unanimous wish is for a second visit."

BRIGHTON.

On Sabbath last Dr. Henry brought to a close a four-days' mission at Florence Road Baptist Church, Brighton. The visit will long be remembered. His forceful addresses were listened to with the greatest interest, and made a very deep impression. Dr. Henry is never dull. His audience never goes to sleep. His rousing, passionate speech stirs the mind, the heart, and the conscience; while the white heat of his enthusiasm sets the audience on fire. One result of the mission is sure to be the quickening of the life of the Church in the holy crusade against the terrible foe of strong drink. Dr. Henry was assisted by Mr. T. Armon Jones, who held the audiences spellbound by his magnificent voice as he rendered sweet Christian melodies.

On Thursday evening Dr. Henry spoke on "The Drinker Under the Spiritual X-Rays;" on Friday afternoon on "Drink, the Supreme Hindrance to the Establishment of Christ's Kingdom;" in the evening on "The War against Strong Drink." On Saturday night he gave a special lecture on "Public House Life in America," illustrated by limelight views. On Sabbath morning the subject chosen was "Christ-like Service!" in the afternoon "Life's Supreme Opportunity;" and in the evening an eloquent address was given on "Stop, Look, Listen," from Isaiah i. 18.

This brought to a close a sixteen-weeks' autumn campaign.

About Books.

The 20,000 facts of the day, biographies, tables, diagrams, and maps gathered in the "Daily Mail" Year Book cover a field which touches every life at many points, and it will be found a useful book of reference. (1s.)

One of the most touching of the stories of the early Christian martyrs is told in beautiful fashion by Mrs. Josephine Butler in St. Agnes. (6d. Christian Commonwealth Office.) Circulated with discrimination, the booklet cannot fail to act as a powerful plea in the cause of social purity.

By Way of Illustration: A Handbook for Preachers, Teachers, and Christian Workers. By J. Ellis. (1s. Allenson.) Another compilation by the Editor of "The Tool Basket," and other manuals. It is a repertory of good things, as "feathers for arrows." This collection of illustrative incidents and bright sayings will be welcome to many who are unable to gather for themselves.

Birds, Beasts and Fishes, by S. H. Hamer, is a brightly written book, relating how a little girl called Elsie, who is a frequent visitor to the Zoological Gardens, is left by herself on several occasions, and gets into conversation with the various animals, birds, fishes, and insects. They tell her all about themselves and each other, and Elsie is very much interested in their talk. (1s. 6d. Cassells.)

The "Quiet Hour" series of small books has been enriched by the addition of Rev. C. G. Moore's Out of His Treasure. It is a collection of brief devotional meditations which have already yielded instruction and encouragement to many Christians, and in this permanent form their ministry will be enlarged and their usefulness more widely appreciated. (1s. Marshall Bros.)

During the leisure hours of a well-earned missionary furlough, Rev. W. S. Moule has prepared, from addresses previously given by him to Chinese students in the Training College at Ningpo, Holy Communion, or the Supper of the Lord. (1s. Chas. J. Thynne.) We cannot describe its aim better than in the words of the preface—"to set out in order the teaching of Holy Scripture on the subject of the Lord's Supper, and to show how this teaching is expressed in the Order of the Administration of Holy Communion in the Church of England."

Nonconformists of every denomination will welcome the succinct history of The Free Church Movement in England, from the pen of Rev. David Heath. Far from being dry dissertations, the discourses, which were prepared for the students of Ranmoor College at the request of the Methodist New Connexion Conference, are uniformly characterized by freshness and force. The author gives evidence of careful reading and research, and from a sympathetic and well-informed mind he has written to practical purpose. (2s. 6d. Stockwell.)

Problems of the Town Church, by George A. Miller, B.A., is a discussion of needs and methods. Written by an American, it aims to throw light upon labour in small towns; many have written on city work and workers, and it were time something was done to help those who have at heart the welfare of the less prominent churches. Mr. Miller has digested the views and experiences of many in his very suggestive book, which is so comprehensive in range as to deal with both temporal and spiritual interests. (2s. 6d. Fleming H. Revell Co.)

Sea-girt Yezo: Glimpses at Missionary Work in North Japan. By Rev. John Batchelor. (2s. 6d. Church Missionary Society.) A book for young people, from the pen of a well-known C.M.S. worker. While instructive and entertaining things are said of the Hokkaido jurisdiction, the pages cannot be said to exhaust their object along that line; in the words of the author, they record "miracles of conversion," and exhibit "seals and signs that the Gospel is true." Printer, artist, and binder have done their part to make this book "the very thing" for presentation to young folk interested in the cause of missions.

The Book of Praises; or, The Psalms.—Mr. C. E. Stuart has given us helpful expositions of several portions of Holy Writ. In this volume, he attempts to trace the sequence of the Psalms. His point of view is peculiar; he regards the entire book as prophetic, and for the most part of events still future, "as regards the godly remnant of Israel, as well as the bringing in of millennial peace, not by the preaching of the Word, but by the sword out of Christ's mouth, and by the avenging hand of God's earthly people (Psa. cxlix. 6-9)." That many passages in the Songs of Zion look forward to still future events, we of course admit; but to deny them a practical relation to present events and experience, is, in our judgment, to carry dispensational interpretation to a dangerous extreme. (3s. 6d. Marlborough.)

The Water Street Mission in New York has come to be well known among Christians in all parts of the world in connection with its founder, who was that remarkable evangelist, the ex-criminal, Mr. "Jerry" McAuley. Since Mr. McAuley's death, the work has been carried on by one of his converts, Mr. Samuel H. Hadley, who now tells the story of the work in Down in Water Street. The book is full of striking incident and of glorious illustrations of the power of God to save the most degraded. To read this stirring record of soul-winning, is to be moved to praise and thanksgiving. (3s. 6d. net. Fleming H. Revell Co.)

The Bible in Modern English. Vol. 3. Translated by Ferrar Fenton. (2s. 6d. net. Partridge.) This volume contains the writings of the prophets—Isaiah to Malachi, leaving only the Hagiographa of the Massoretic division to be dealt with in order to complete the Old Testament Scriptures after Mr. Fenton's manner. Though disapproving much in the execution of the work—its unrestrained tone as well as its reckless conjectures—we recognize that the translator has brought a lively imagination and much devotion to his work. All the same, this version cannot be recommended to those who seek reliable help in the study of the Sacred Records.

A question often before the Christian public is ably discussed in The Ministry of Women, a paper by the late Dr. A. J. Gordon, reprinted from "The Missionary Review of the World." (2d. Morgan & Scott.) The language of Scripture on the subject is carefully and minutely examined; and the fact clearly shown that there is another side to the deprecation of the ministry of women. But apart from all such discussion, the final exegesis is not to be found through the lexicon and grammar. The voice of the Church must not be taken apart from the Word, but the Spirit is in the Word, and He has set aside all cavilling in the matter by the abundant blessing vouchsafed to such workers.

To his many volumes of helps for preachers and teachers, Dr. Louis Albert Banks, of New York City, adds one more, which is as good as any that have preceded—Windows for Sermons: A Study of the Art of Sermonic Illustration, together with Four Hundred Fresh Illustrations for Sermons and Reform Addresses. (6s. Funk & Wagnalls Co.) The author knows where to find illustrative material, and how to serve it up for use. He points a moral in the brightest style, as his various publications show. In this substantial book he is the teacher of those to whom the art is less familiar; his advice is practical, and the gatherings from reading and observation are compactly presented.

The Master and His Method, by Rev. E. Griffith Jones, B.A. (1s. net. Hodder & Stoughton.) Here we have the latest addition to the series of "Christian Study Manuals." It reveals deep thought and careful preparation. The author has a genius for compiling facts and data, and spares no pains or labour in presenting them in a succinct and convenient form. The Scriptural references alone show deep research. Written from a "moderately broad" standpoint, we may not agree with all its statements, and the earlier chapters seem to us to treat of the human aspects of our Lord's ministry without laying sufficient emphasis upon the Divine knowledge which He possessed. But while the book is especially valuable to students, the devotional reader who peruses it with intelligent care will find it full of suggestive thought which cannot be otherwise than helpful as an aid to mastering the conditions in which our Lord's earthly life was set, the methods He adopted, and the principles He taught.

References to Scripture are plentiful and apt in Two Questions Asked By the Dowager Lady Pigot. The answers are clear, telling, and helpful. (1s. 6d. per 100. Partridge.)

Prayer Groups.

REV. J. LANDEL JONES (of Blackheath) writes that when the Simultaneous Mission was in contemplation he was led to spend much time before God, asking for a message regarding the means which should be used to make the Mission a success. The answer came. It was borne in on his mind that the conditions did not lie in the weekly prayer meetings of the Church, in the public prayer on Sunday, in the resolutions at Church meetings, or in family prayer. Let the members of the Church group themselves in threes and fours, each group to meet once a week for half an hour, to pray for one thing, namely, power from on high. A lukewarm Church cannot save, and this will prove to be a successful remedy for the lukewarmness.

The late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes was deeply impressed with the thought, and wrote several letters laying great stress upon the value and necessity of the preparation. Referring to one meeting at which he was asked to speak, he said, "I will take the opportunity of advertising and advocating your happy idea of grouping. I will also call attention once more to the Real Presence of the Living Divine Christ, which I am confident is the secret of Evangelical success." In a later note he added, "If the conscience of the Christian Church in relation to drunkenness could be roused, it would indeed be a blessed abiding result."

Writing in July last, Rev. F. B. Meyer said: "Mr. Jones seem to be apart for one thing just now—to stir up our people to more prayer. He rendered us great assistance in this direction while the Simultaneous Mission was being proposed; and I think that the highest results might accrue if only at the meetings of county unions and elsewhere he might have an opportunity of bearing his simple and earnest testimony. Men of one aim and purpose are the men that are to be feared and felt. I heartily commend him to my brethren as one whom God uses in this direction."

At the Noon Prayer Meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., on Monday last, Mr. Landel Jones recounted, to a deeply interested audience, the Lord's dealings with him, in leading him out to prayer for revival. Through a profound sense of responsibility for the perishing he entered into a calm realization that prayer would be answered if Christians would group themselves with this object in view. This was done with much blessing prior to the Simultaneous Mission. Mr. Jones also dwelt forcibly on the primary need for prayer for a purified church, delivered from lukewarmness, and then fervently seeking to win souls for the Master.

Personalia.

A wide circle of friends will learn with regret that Miss Mason has suffered a serious breakdown in health. There is no sign of organic complaint, only extreme weakness, necessitating constant attendance. Assuredly our readers will pray that this precious life may be spared. The latest intelligence is of a slight rally, during which our esteemed friend quoted one of her favourite hymns: "How Good is the God we adore."

Mr. C. Russell Hurditch sends us a pathetic letter regarding the condition of his son Philip. After hope had been abandoned, "God came in, giving a slight improvement on the Monday, and with refreshing sleep during successive nights, and other improved conditions, my son is still improving—to the astonishment of the medical men, though by no means yet out of danger. Please pray on." Friends will be glad to learn that Mr. C. R. Hurditch is himself completely recovered from his recent illness.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Lord Llangattock has promised a sum of £15,000 to the Bishop of Rochester's "Twenty Mission Institutes Fund," and it will be equally divided between St. Mary's, Bermondsey, St. James's, Bermondsey, and St. Mary's, Southwark—three of the poorest parishes in South London. All these three churches are in Evangelical hands.

To deal with the large numbers of homeless men in the embankment district, the Church Army has still further increased its local accommodation. In addition to the Embankment Home in Millbank Street, and the tent shelter in Westminster Bridge Road, which between them have lodged 200 men nightly, a soup kitchen and shelter for another 200 men has now been opened in Romney Street. The premises consist of a disused public house, shortly to be demolished for the new embankment scheme, and kindly let to the Society, at this time of special distress, by the London County Council at a nominal rental.

Congregational.

A mission hall, seating 150, erected at Vickerstown, Walney Island, on a site given by Messrs. Vickers, Sons, and Maxim, has been opened.

Dr. Guinness Rogers addressed an enthusiastic audience at the public meeting lately held in commemoration of the jubilee of the church at Camberwell, S.E. He spoke from personal knowledge of the good work done by former pastors, and urged the continuance of the missionary and evangelical spirit which the Church has always exhibited. Rev. Thos. Stepheus, pastor, stated that this Church was the mother of two other Congregational Churches in the district, and referred appreciatively to the efforts of laymen in connection with the work.

Baptist.

Meetings were held at Fishergate Church, Preston, on December 11, in recognition of the settlement, as pastor, of Rev. W. T. Whitley, M.A., LL.D., late principal of the Baptist College of Victoria, and secretary of the Victorian Baptist Foreign Mission. Mr. Robert P. Furness and Alderman Hamilton extended a welcome from church and congregation. Dr. Whitley expressed his readiness to respond to their call, and to labour among them in the service of Christ. He dwelt on the need for co-operation in every form of Christian work with all other Evangelical churches, while not abating true Baptist missionary zeal. Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, M.A., spoke of his long acquaintance with the new pastor. He then adverted to the spread of materialism and the resurgence of mediæval Catholicism which is helping to negative true religion. Against these tendencies it behoves all Christians to stand, and to work unselfishly for the spread of Christ's teaching.

Addressing an audience of 500 men at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on Sunday week, Rev. Thomas Phillips made an "Appeal for Greater Thoughtfulness." He declared that in spite of free education and an unfettered Press, there is not so much hard, deep thinking as in the past. There has been a growth in smartness, but not in depth; a growth of knowledge, but not of conviction. Some of the causes for this are the introduction of machinery into industrial pursuits, men becoming mere machines; the abundance of scrappy literature that is read, destroying the taste and capacity for concentration of thought; the disillusionment of unfulfilled political dreams; and the growth of religious parasitism whereby men depend too much for religious thought upon others—the clergy, the priest, the minister.

Methodist.

A new Wesleyan Mission Hall in Cowley Road, Liverpool, has been formally opened. It is built to meet the needs of a large and new neighbourhood, and has seating accommodation for 400 persons. The opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. Isaac Mack. Rev. T. J. Choate (Chairman of the District) preached to a large congregation.

The Wesleyan Chapel Committee for chapel and school extension is now dealing with some 380 buildings, involving an estimated expenditure of more than one million sterling. The gross outlay on chapels alone, after deducting the debt covered by rental, and the cost of the mission halls (about £500,000) in cases spread over the last four years, and already sanctioned, is £766,313. In the distribution of grants from the Twentieth Century Fund, a 15 per cent. aid will be made on the net amount actually raised in the circuits promoting new schemes.

Rev. W. E. Sellers, superintendent of the Wesleyan Surrey and North Hants Mission, proposes to make the new church at Godalming a memorial of the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, and appeals for support. "The church and schools together with the site will cost £6,500. Of this amount we can already see our way clear to £3,500. We therefore require £3,000 to open the buildings free of debt. We should not like any debt to remain on any building honoured by Mr. Price Hughes' name. We therefore suggest that the Church of Christ might very fittingly make an offering of this amount in memory of one of its greatest sons."

Twelve representatives each of the Methodist New Connexion, the United Methodist Free Church, and the Bible Christian Church met in the Memorial Hall on Thursday last to discuss the organic union of the junior Methodist Churches. Rev. William Redfern presided. It was agreed that the effort begun by that meeting should be continued, "so as to formulate and present to their next Church Conferences and Annual Assembly practical proposals which may lead to an early union of the churches." The hope was also expressed that this result would lead ultimately to "the organic union of every section of Methodism in our great Methodist Church." It was decided to hold another meeting early next year.

Presbyterian.

Rev. Principal Dykes conducted the services at the new station at Hove, Brighton, on Sunday week. There were good attendances at both services.

A new hall has been opened at Byker, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The congregation and friends gathered in the church, from which they marched in procession, and with praise, into the hall (seated for 500), which Mrs. Dobson, of Jesmond, declared open.

Society of Friends.

The Australian papers record the arrival of Mr. Joshua Rowntree, formerly M.P. for Scarborough, who is visiting the Commonwealth as a delegate from the English Society of Friends. He is accompanied by the secretary of the London organization of the Society. The object of their mission is to give an independent organization to the members of the society within the boundaries of the Commonwealth. Hitherto the Australian Friends have been under the jurisdiction of the yearly meeting of the parent society in England. Early in November Mr. Rowntree met deputies from all the States of the Commonwealth in the Friends' Meeting House, Melbourne, and it is understood that the object of his visit was successfully accomplished.

An address has been presented to the Baron de Staal, on his retirement from the post of Russian Ambassador in this country, signed by Joseph G. and Josephine Alexander, Edmund Wright Brooks, Francis William Fox, and Ellen Robinson. In the course of the address it is said:—"We recognise with thankfulness that, during your long tenure of office in England, there has been a marked diminution of those hostile sentiments between our country and yours which we formerly had to deplore, and which at times threatened a renewal of the terrible calamity of war. To this increase of friendliness your influence has, we cannot doubt, materially contributed." A cordial acknowledgment has been received from M. de Staal.

Salvation Army.

The Army's leaders are contemplating the commencement of work in Austria, and are being pressed to send officers to Cairo.

The Army has been asked by the West Ham Board of Guardians to receive 100 men at the Hadleigh Land Colony. The men will be at once received, provided satisfactory terms can be arranged.

The mission work at Glossop, Derbyshire, conducted by Pastor R. Howton, continues to make good progress. Since July last fifty persons have been baptized on profession of faith in Christ. The weekly Bible readings are well attended, and the village branches have become a great power for good. At Mosborough a few colliers have opened, and support a centre wherefrom the Gospel is preached in the district. A number of notorious characters, dog-runners, and gamblers, have been brought to the Lord through the instrumentality of the mission.

Fallen Asleep.

At Clapton, Mrs. Woods, wife of Rev. W. J. Woods, B.A., secretary of the Congregational Union. Mrs. Woods, who was fifty-four years of age, had been in ill-health for some time.—Mr. John Hawking, of Hammersmith, at one time organist at Hyde Park Hall, but more recently engaged in the Lord's work at Avenue Road Church, Shepherd's Bush. He leaves several sons, earnest workers for Christ.—On December 15, at Brompton Hospital for Consumption, aged forty-six, George Robert Parsons, of Stratford, E., formerly an earnest worker, especially as conductor of young people's Bible-classes, but of late, while awaiting the call to rest, a witness for Christ in sanatorium and hospital wards; he suffered and served with great patience, and in his latest breath, while thanking God for the Rock foundation, greeted the Saviour whom he had loved and served from the days of his youth.

Y.M.C.A. and Soldiers' Home for Salisbury.

THE Y.M.C.A. was established in Salisbury, December, 1899, with a small membership, meeting in a small room; it has so rapidly grown that it now numbers 131 members, and has altogether outgrown its accommodation. A new home has become an urgent necessity if the Association is to carry on the great work for which it was started; and a work very much needed among the young men of the city; especially is this so in face of the fact that on Salisbury Plain are stationed many thousands of young soldiers, who come here in large numbers when off duty; and nothing has hitherto been attempted in the city to meet this special need. But by this move of the Y.M.C.A. a refreshment-bar, with reading and recreation-rooms, will be provided for the use of soldiers and volunteers, and a home or welcome opened up to them in the very centre of the city.

A splendid suite of rooms will be provided, such as reading-room, library, conversation, class, and recreation rooms; hall for meetings, which will be also fitted up as a gymnasium restaurant, where refreshments will be provided at moderate cost; and bedrooms for young men and soldiers who may be staying a brief time in the city. All this will mean an outlay of £3,300, but a section of the ground floor will be let off as shops, the rent of which will cover interest on £1,300, leaving the sum of £2,000 to be raised by the Y.M.C.A. Among the subscribers to the fund already are—Mr. E. F. Pye-Smith, £100; Messrs. Frimley Bros., £100; Mr. E. D. Rawlence, £50; Sir George Williams, £25; and Mr. W. H. Seagram, £20. Altogether about £600 has been raised towards the total cost. This is a case of real and urgent need, and any donations will be gratefully received through the Publishers of The Christian, or by Mr. H. C. Messer, Hon. Secretary, 35, Catherine Street, Salisbury.
